The ilium extends far in advance of the acetabulum, and is expansive, widely arching over the pelvic cavity, as in birds. The slender prolonged ischia, in some genera, are ornithic in character, and, in Hypsilophodon at least, unite in a median ventral symphysis. The pubes in some genera are as slender and elongated as in a typical bird. The tibia has a great cnemial crest and a ridge for the fibula, and its distal end is as in a bird, with a fossa to receive the ascending process of the astragalus. The distal end of the fibula is smaller than the proximal, though not so much reduced as in birds. The astragalus, similar to that of a bird, remained distinct in many genera; but in some, as Compsognathus, Ornithotarsus, and Euskelosaurus, it seems to have ankylosed with the tibia. The genera of Ornithoscelida are numerous, ranging throughout the Mesozoic period; the animals are mostly of large size, some of them, as the iguanodon, being among the largest terrestrial animals known. The order is divisible into two suborders, Dinosauria and Compsognatha.

Orthocerus (ôr-thos′ę-rus), n. [NL.: see Orthoceras.] 1. In conch., same as Orthoceras.—2. In entom., a genus of the coleopterous family Colydiidæ, founded by Latreille in 1796, containing four European species, one of which, ★O. clavicornis, extends into Siberia.

orthochromatic (ôr′thō-krō-mat′ik), a. [< Gr. ὀρθός, correct, + χρῶμα, color: see chromatic.] In photog., correct in the relations or in the rendering of colors—that is, free from the usual photographic fault of exaggerating the deepness of greens, yellows, and reds and the brightness of blues and violets. The epithet notes any process by means of which this end may be attained, or any plate, chemical, etc., used in such a process. Ordinary photographic dry plates in which a trace of such agents as eosin or chlorophyl is incorporated possess the orthochromatic property, which is greatly enhanced if the exposure is made through a transparent screen tinted to correspond with the prevalent color in the scene or picture, as green for a landscape, or yellow for a painting characterized by draperies of that hue. Also expressed by isochromatic, an epithet implying equality of exposure to obtain similar results from opposed colors, contrary to the usual photographic experience.

orthochromatize (ôr-thō-krō′mą-tīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. orthochromatized, ppr. orthochromatizing. [< orthochromat(ic) + -ize.] In photog., to render orthochromatic, as a plate; bring into conformity with the conditions necessary to obtain a correct rendering of color-values.

orthoclase (ôr′thō-klāz), n. [< Gr. ὀρθός, straight, right, + κλάσις, fracture: see clastic.] Common or potash feldspar, a silicate of aluminium and potassium, occurring in monoclinic crystals and also massive. It has two perfect cleavages, at right angles to each other (whence the name). It varies much in color, from white to yellow, red, and green. Adularia, including most moonstone, is a crystallized variety, transparent or nearly so, characteristic especially of the crystalline rocks of the Alps; valencianite, from Valenciana, Mexico, is similar to it. Sanidine is a glassy variety, usually containing more or less soda; it is characteristic of certain igneous rocks, as trachyte, phonolite, etc.; rhyacolite, from Monte Somma, Vesuvius, is similar. Loxoclase is a variety from Hammond, New York, and murchisonite one from Exeter, England, the latter showing golden-yellow reflections on a surface nearly parallel to the orthopinacoid. Orthoclase is an essential constituent of granite and some other crystalline rocks, and often occurs in large masses in granite-veins, and is then quarried and used in making pottery. Much of the potash feldspar called orthoclase is really the related triclinic species microcline. The name anorthoclase has been given to some kinds of triclinic feldspar containing considerable potash, which are more closely related to albite than to microcline in optical characters. See feldspar. Also called orthose.

orthoclastic (ôr-thō-klas′tik), a. [< Gr. ὀρθός, straight, right, + κλαστός, verbal adj. of κλᾶν, break.] Characterized by cleavages at right angles to one another: said of certain species of the feldspar group, particularly orthoclase; pertaining to such species, or specifically to orthoclase.

Orthocœla (ôr-thō-sē′lą), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὀρθός, straight, + κοῖλος, hollow.] One of three orders into which the rhabdocœlous turbellarians are sometimes divided.

orthocœlic (ôr-thō-sē′lik), a. [< Gr. ὀρθός, straight, + κοιλία, the belly, the intestines.] Arranged in straight or parallel folds: applied to the intestines of birds when they are thus disposed, in distinction from cyclocœlic.

orthodiagonal (ôr″thō-dī-ag′ō-nal), n. and a. [< Gr. ὀρθός, straight, + διάγωνος, diagonal: see diagonal.] I. n. In crystal., the diagonal or lateral axis in a monoclinic solid which is at right angles with the vertical axis; also, the plane which includes the two axes named.

II. a. Pertaining to or in the direction of the orthodiagonal.

orthodomatic (ôr″thō-dō-mat′ik), a. [< orthodome + -atic[2].] Pertaining to or in the direction of an orthodome.

orthodome (ôr′thō-dōm), n. [< Gr. ὀρθός, straight, + δόμος, δῶμα, a house: see dome[1], 5.] In crystal., a dome, in the monoclinic system, parallel to that lateral axis which is at right angles to the vertical axis. It is properly a hemidome, since a given form includes but two planes. See dome[1], 5.

orthodox (ôr′thō-doks), a. [= F. orthodoxe = Sp. ortodoxo = Pg. orthodoxo = It. ortodosso, < LL. orthodoxus, < LGr. ὀρθόδοξος, having a right opinion, < Gr. ὀρθός, straight, right, correct, + δόξα, opinion: see dogma, doxology.] 1. Holding what is regarded as the correct opinion, or correct opinions, especially in regard to religious or theological doctrines; sound in opinion or doctrine; specifically, conforming to the faith of the Church Catholic, as represented in its primitive ecumenical creeds: applied to persons or doctrines. That which seems to one part of the Christian church orthodox may be held by another to be heterodox. Thus, the Roman Catholic Church regards Protestant churches as heterodox; again, the Reformed churches sometimes deny the title orthodox to one another; and generally those who hold to the Trinitarian faith deny the epithet orthodox to the Unitarians and Universalists. Orthodoxy is not usually denied to those who are charged with having added articles to the ecumenical faith of Christendom, but only to those who are charged with denying a part of that faith. Thus, the Roman Catholic is not ordinarily refused by Protestants the right to the epithet orthodox; nor are Trinitarians denied the right to that epithet by those of Unitarian belief. Orthodox is the common epithet of the Greek Church (of which the full official title is "the Holy Orthodox Catholic Apostolic Oriental Church"), as Catholic is of the Roman Church. [The word is employed locally in New England to designate the Trinitarian Congregational churches as distinguished from those of the same order which hold the Unitarian or Universalist faith, as in the phrase "the Orthodox Church." It is also used to distinguish the Trinitarian Quakers from those whose belief is or tends toward Unitarianism.]

> 'Tis the Orthodox Tenet, that there never was any remission of Sins but by the blood of the Lamb that was slain from the beginning of the World.
> Milton, Ans. to Salmasius, Works, III. 182.

E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 198.

Orthodox school, in polit. econ. See political.—Syn. 1. Orthodox, Evangelical. (See the definitions of these terms.) It is natural for all who care about their doctrinal beliefs to claim the titles that indicate correctness of belief. Hence orthodox is a part of the name of the Greek Church; to the Roman Catholic orthodox means faithful to the tenets of the Roman Church; in the doctrinal contests of America orthodox has generally meant Calvinistic, especially as opposed to Unitarianism and Universalism; in England it has as generally meant High-church, as opposed to Low-church or evangelical. Evangelical, meaning in harmony with the Gospel, has been claimed somewhat similarly and for a like reason, but has been especially applied to those who emphasize the doctrine of salvation by faith in Christ alone.

The facial angles that have been chiefly used in the definition of these terms are known as Camper's, Geoffroy Saint-Hilaire's and Cuvier's, Jacquart's, and Cloquet's (which see, under craniometry). A more recent facial angle is that included between the nasio-alveolar line and a line drawn through the supra-auricular point and the inferior margin of the orbit (German anthropologists); when this is between 83° and 90°, the skull is said to be orthognathous. The same character is also defined by means of the gnathic or alveolar index (Flower), those skulls with a gnathic index below 98 being orthognathous; between 98 and 103, mesognathous; and above 103, prognathous.

Orthoptera (ôr-thop'te-rą), n. pl. [NL. (Latreille, 1806) (F. Orthoptères, Olivier, 1789), neut. pl. of orthopterus, straight-winged: see orthopterous.] An order of the class Insecta proposed by Olivier in 1789 for certain straight-winged insects which Linnæus had placed in Hemiptera, and to which De Geer in 1773 had restricted the order Hemiptera, placing the true bugs in a new order Dermaptera. The order as now understood contains insects in which metamorphosis is incomplete and wings are almost always present, of which the hinder pair are dilated, folded from the base, and of membranous texture, while the fore pair are more or less coriaceous, usually narrow and straight (but variable in this respect), and thickly veined. These insects are active and capable of feeding in all stages from birth to death. Seven families — or, as some consider, tribes or superfamilies — are now recognized. These are the Blattidæ, or cockroaches; Mantidæ, or praying-insects; Phasmidæ, or walking-sticks; Gryllidæ, or crickets; Locustidæ, or long-horned grasshoppers or katydids; and Acrididæ, or short-horned grasshoppers or true locusts, including the migratory species. (See locust for an explanation of the fact that the Locustidæ are not locusts.) The Orthoptera are in the main herbivorous, but the Mantidæ are carnivorous, and some of the Blattidæ are omnivorous. They are found all over the world, but most numerously in the tropics, where among them are the largest known representatives of the whole insect class. All the known species are terrestrial or arboreal, no aquatic forms having been discovered; and according to their habitual mode of progression the families have been grouped by Westwood as Cursoria, Raptoria, Ambulatoria, and Saltatoria. The Orthoptera are among the earliest forms of insect life to appear in geologic time, and the Blattidæ in particular are very numerous in some geological formations. The main characters used in classifying the Orthoptera are derived from the modifications of the genitals, mouth-parts, and antennæ. See cuts under Blattidæ, Gryllidæ, Insecta, katydid, locust, and Mantis.

These words, as well as oryktographie, were somewhat extensively used by Continental geologists, in the early part of the nineteenth century, with a meaning nearly equivalent to what is now comprehended under the terms mineralogy and lithology; and this also included more or less, according to the usage of various authors, of economical and mining or "applied" geology. The terms corresponding to oryctography and oryctognosy have been dropped from the Continental languages for fully fifty years, and the use of the words in English became correspondingly rare. os[3] (os), n. [Sw. ås, pl. åsar.] In geol., a Swedish term, equivalent to esker, for certain elongated ridges of detrital material, generally explained as having been deposited in subglacial tunnels. They frequently receive branches, as rivers do; but they are peculiar in following the general slope of the region, with little regard to local inequalities. Some of these ridges in Sweden are, except for minor interruptions, over a hundred miles in length, and so regular in form that they are not infrequently used as roads. At their southern end they are sometimes associated with larger stratified deposits, as if the subglacial torrent there flowed from the ice-tunnel into open water. In Scotland they are called kames, in Ireland eskers. See esker. Osar, imitating the Swedish plural, is sometimes used as the singular in English: hence esker is to be preferred to os.

osculate (os′kū-lāt), v.; pret. and pp. osculated, ppr. osculating. [< L. osculatus, pp. of osculari, kiss, < osculum, a little mouth, a pretty mouth, a kiss, dim. of os, a mouth: see os[2], oral, etc.] I. trans. 1. To salute with a kiss; kiss. Imp. Dict.—2. In geom., to have a higher contact with; touch as closely as possible. Thus, a plane or a circle is said to osculate a curve when it has three coincident points in common with the curve—that is, it occupies such a position (and in the case of the circle has such a size) that as it is brought up into this position three points of intersection with the curve run into one. A sphere is said to osculate a tortuous curve when it has four coincident points in common with the curve. In these cases, to osculate means to have the greatest number of coincident and successive points common to a fixed locus which is compatible with the general character of the locus which osculates; and some geometers restrict the word to this meaning. This meaning is also extended to time: thus, the osculating elements of a planet are those elliptic elements which would satisfy three exact observations made at times infinitely little removed from a given epoch. But osculate is also used loosely to mean merely that the loci in question have three or more coincident points in common. A tangent-line or -plane is never said to osculate a curve or surface unless it has more than ordinary contact with it.

II. intrans. 1. To kiss one another; kiss. Imp. Dict.—2. In geom., to have, as two loci, three or more coincident and successive points in common. See I., 2.—3. A principal Egyptian god, personifying the power of good and the sunlight, united in history and in worship in a sacred triad with Isis as his wife and Horus as their child. He is son of Seb and Nut, or Heaven and Earth. His antagonist is Set, the deity of evil or darkness, by whom he is slain; but he is avenged by Horus, and reigns in the lower world. With him was formally identified every departed soul in its nether abode, to be protected by him in the necessary conflict with the genius of evil. The worship of Osiris was extended, at about the beginning of the Christian era, over Asia Minor, Greece, and Rome. In art Osiris is usually represented as a mummy, wearing the crown of Upper Egypt, often flanked by ostrich-plumes. The accompanying cut represents a bronze figurine in the Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York.

It does not occur native, but has been found to constitute a part of the native platina of all the platiniferous regions (South America, California, Australia, Russia), in the form of iridosmium, an alloy of the metals osmium and iridium. The specific gravity of the artificially obtained metal has been found to be 22.477; hence it is the heaviest substance known. It has recently been fused. Its crystalline form is either that of the cube or that of a very obtuse rhombohedron. The crystals are of a bluish-white color, with a violet luster, and are harder than glass. Osmium is not used in the arts, except in the form of iridosmium, of which material the tips of gold pens are made.

osmose (os′mōs), n. [< NL. osmosis, < Gr. ὠσμός, impulsion, pushing, < ὠθεῖν, thrust, push, impel.] The impulse or tendency of fluids to pass through porous partitions and mix or become diffused through each other; the phenomena attending the passage of fluids, whether liquids or gases, through a porous septum. It is a kind of diffusion (see diffusion), and includes endosmosis and exosmosis—the former being distinguished either as the tendency of the outer fluid to pass through into the inner, or as the action of that fluid which passes with the greater rapidity into the other. When two saline solutions differing in strength and composition are separated by a porous diaphragm or septum of bladder, parchment-paper, or porous earthenware, they mutually pass through and mix with each other; but they pass with unequal rapidities, so that after a time the height of the liquid is not the same on both sides. These phenomena are explained by the unequal molecular attraction exerted between the capillary apertures in the porous diaphragm and the different liquids experimented upon.

2†. Capable of being shown; that may be shown; proper or intended to be shown.—Ostensible partner, in law, a partner whose name is made known, and who appears to the world, as such, as distinguished from a secret or dormant partner; also used in distinction from one so known who is really not such, called a nominal partner.—Syn. 1. Ostensible, Colorable, Specious, Plausible. The first three of these words are drawn from that which is addressed to the eye, plausible from that which is addressed to the ear. Ostensible is, literally, that may be or is held out as true, real, actual, or intended, but may or may not be so: thus, a person's ostensible motive for some action is the motive that appears to the observer, and is held out to him as the real motive, which it may or may not be. Colorable suggests the possibility of giving the color or aspect of one thing to another, especially of giving the appearance of truth or justice; it has a bad sense, but approaches a good one in the following: "All his [James I. of Scotland's] acquisitions, however fatal to the body of the nobles, had been gained by attacks upon individuals; and, being founded on circumstances peculiar to the persons who suffered, might excite murmurs and apprehensions, but afforded no colorable pretext for a general rebellion" (Robertson, quoted in Crabbe, p. 218). The word is much the least often used of the four. Specious is superficially fair, just, or correct, appearing well at first view but easily proved unsound. Plausible is applied to that which pleases the ear or the superficial judgment, but will not bear severe examination. Ostensible reasons; colorable claims; specious means; plausible explanations.

Ostracopoda (os-trạ-kop′ō-dạ̈), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὄστρακον, a shell, + πούς (ποδ-) = E. foot.] An order of entomostracous crustaceans, related to the Cladocera (Daphniacea) and Phyllopoda. It is characterized by a small, thin, and often calcified bivalve shell, or hinged shell-like valves, consisting of two unequal lateral parts of an unsymmetrical carapace, movably joined together and often peculiarly ornamented; a rudimentary abdomen; a very small shell-gland; the body not ringed, ending in a bifid tail; very few thoracic appendages (generally two or three), not foliaceous, but cylindroid, like the legs of higher crustaceans; branchiæ attached to the oral appendages; eyes, when present, median and coalesced or lateral and separate; and antennules and antennæ large and subserving locomotion. The Ostracopoda are mostly minute fresh-water crustaceans, swimming very actively by means of their antennæ; some carry their eggs about with them like ordinary Crustacea, but most attach them to foreign substances, as aquatic plants. These crustaceans are common in all geologic strata from the earlier Paleozoic formations, and appear to have undergone little modification. There are several families and a number of genera, such as Cypris and Cythere. Now called Ostracoda. See cuts under Cypris and Cythereidæ.

ostracostean (os-trạ-kos′tē-ạn), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to the Ostracostei, or having their characters; placoderm.

II. n. A fish of the group Ostracostei; a placoderm.

Ostracostei (os-trạ-kos′tē-ī), n. pl. [NL., pl. of ostracosteus: see ostracosteous.] A group of extinct placoganoid fishes having the head and generally the anterior part of the trunk incased in a strong armor composed of many large ganoid plates immovably joined to one another. Also called Placodermata.

ostracosteous (os-trạ-kos′tē-us), a. [< NL. ostracosteus, < Gr. ὄστρακον, a shell, + ὀστέον, a bone.] Covered with shell-like plates of bone; ostracostean; placodermatous.

Ostrapoda (os-trap′ō-dạ̈), n. pl. Same as Ostracopoda.

Ostrea (os′trē-ạ̈), n. [NL., < L. ostrea, rarely ostreum, < Gr. ὄστρεον, an oyster: see oyster.] The typical and leading genus of the oyster family, Ostreidæ, having the shell inequilateral and inequivalve, with one valve flatter than the other. There are upward of 200 species, besides many natural and artificial varieties. The genus extends back to the Carboniferous, and there are more species extinct than extant. The common edible oyster of Europe is O. edulis; that of the Atlantic coast of the United States is O. virginica. See also cuts under ciborium and integropalliate.

ostreaceous (os-trē-ā′shius), a. [< NL. ostreaceus*, < L. ostrea, an oyster: see Ostrea.] Same as ostracean.

This distinction of two interior vehicles or tunicles of the soul, besides that outer vestment of the terrestrial body (styled in Plato τὸ ὀστρεῶδες, the crustaceous or ostreaceous body), is not a mere figment of the latter Platonists since Christianity, but a tradition derived down from antiquity. Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 790.

ostreiculture (os″trē-i-kul′tūr), n. [Irreg. < L. ostrea, oyster, + cultura, culture.] Oyster-culture; the artificial breeding and cultivation of oysters. Also ostreaculture.

Ostreidæ (os-trē′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Ostrea + -idæ.] A family of monomyarian bivalve mollusks, the oysters, typified by the genus Ostrea, to which various limits have been assigned. (a) In Woodward's and older systems, a large group including all forms with the mantle quite open, a very small foot or none, an inequivalve shell, free or adherent to foreign bodies, resting on one valve, with central beaks, internal ligament, single adductor muscle, and obscure pallial line. Thus it included not only the Ostreidæ proper, but also Anomiidæ, Placunidæ, Pectinidæ, Limidæ, and Spondylidæ. (b) Now restricted to oysters which have the mantle-margin double and finely fringed, nearly equal gills united to one another behind, and the mantle-lobes forming a complete branchial chamber. The shell is irregular, being both inequivalve and inequilateral, attached by the left valve, and the ligament-cavity is triangular or elongated. In structure the shell is subnacreous, and laminated with prismatic cellular substance. Thus limited, the Ostreidæ contain only the oysters and closely related bivalves, of which there are many species, extinct and extant. Pearl-oysters belong to a different though related family, Aviculidæ.

ostreophagist (os-trē-of′ạ-jist), n. [< Gr. ὄστρεον, an oyster, + φαγεῖν, eat, + -ist.] An oyster-eater; one who or that which eats or feeds upon oysters.

★ostrich (os′trich), n. [Formerly also ostridge, austridge, estridge; < ME. ostriche, ostryche, ostrice, oystriche, < OF. ostruche, ostruce, austruche, F. autruche = Pr. estruz = Sp. avestruz = Pg. abestruz, < LL. avis struthio(n-), also simply struthio(n-) (the native word avis, bird, being added to the foreign name of the bird), < Gr. στρουθίων, an ostrich, earlier στρουθοκάμηλος (> L. struthiocamelus for struthio camelus or struthocamelus*), an ostrich, lit. 'camel-bird,' so called with ref. to its long neck, < στρουθός, a bird, esp. a sparrow; cf. ὁ μέγας στρουθός, lit. 'the great bird,' στρουθὸς κατάγαιος, 'ground-bird,' στρουθὸς χερσαῖος, 'land-bird,' στρουθὸς Λιβυκός, 'Libyan bird,' στρουθὸς Αράβιος, 'Arabian bird,' or simply στρουθός, all applied to the ostrich. From the LL. struthio are also AS. strūta = OHG. MHG. strūz, G. strausz; also, after MHG., MLG. strūs = D. struis = Sw. struts = Dan. struds; also It. struzzo, dim. struzzolo, = OF. strucion (> ML. reflex strucio(n-) and ME. strucioun), ostrich.] A very large ratite bird of the genus Struthio. The true or African ostrich (S. camelus) inhabits the sandy plains of Africa and Arabia, and is the largest of all existing birds, attaining a height of from 6 to 8 feet. The head and neck are nearly naked, and the quill-feathers of the wings and tail have their barbs wholly disconnected. It is chiefly for these plumes, which are highly esteemed as articles of dress and decoration, that the bird is hunted and also reared in domestication. The legs are extremely strong, the thighs are naked, and the tarsi are covered with scales. There are only two toes, the first and second being wanting. The pubic bones are united—a conformation occurring in no other bird. The wings are of small size and incapable of being used as organs of flight; the birds can run with extraordinary speed, distancing the fleetest horse. The food consists of grass, grain, and other substances of a vegetable nature. Ostriches are polygamous, every male consorting with several females, and they generally keep together in larger or smaller flocks. The eggs are of great size, averaging three pounds each in weight, and several hens often lay in the same nest, which is merely a hole scraped in the sand. The eggs appear to be hatched mainly by incubation, both parents relieving each other in the task, but also partly by the heat of the sun. The South African ostrich is S. australis; others are S. molydophanes and S. meridionalis. Three South American birds of the genus Rhea are popularly known as the American ostrich, though they are not very closely allied to the true ostrich, differing in having three-toed feet and in many other respects. The best-known of the three is R. americana, the nandu or nanduguaçu of the Brazilians, inhabiting the great American pampas south of the equator. It is considerably smaller than the true ostrich, and its plumage is much inferior. R. darwini, a native of Patagonia, is still smaller, and belongs to a different subgenus (Ptilocnemis). The third species is the R. macrorhyncha, so called from its long bill; it is perhaps only a variety of the first.

otolith (ō′tō-lith), n. [< Gr. οὖς (ὠτ-), ear, + λίθος, stone.] 1. A calcareous concretion within the membranous labyrinth of the ear. In fishes and fish-like vertebrates they are sometimes of great size. In higher animals otoliths are generally wanting or reduced to small particles or ear-dust. (See otoconium.) Among some common fishes the otolith decreases in size in the following order: cod, hake, haddock, whiting, conger, turbot, sole, gurnard, smelt, and trout. The concretions differ much in shape. In the conger the otolith is shaped like a sole, 1¼ inches long, ⅝ inch wide, and is thin and glassy. In the cod it is of the size of a horse-bean, and is curved on itself. The ear-stones of the American sheepshead are shaped like a tamarind-seed, and look like pieces of milky quartz. They are often carried in the pocket as "lucky stones."

Canada Otter (Lutra canadensis).

There are several genera, as Tarangia (or Leptonyx), Aonyx, Lontra (or Saricovia), Lutra proper, Hydrogale, and Pteronura. They all have large flattish heads, short ears, webbed toes, crooked nails, and tails slightly flattened horizontally. The common river-otter, the Lutra vulgaris of Europe, is a quadruped adapted to amphibious habits by its short, strong, flexible, palmated feet, which serve as oars to propel it through the water, and by its long and strong tail, which acts as a powerful rudder, and enables the animal to change its course with great ease and rapidity. It inhabits the banks of rivers, and feeds principally on fish. When its retreat is found, the otter instantly takes the water and dives, remaining a long time underneath it, and rising at a considerable distance from the place where it dived. The weight of a full-grown male is from 20 to 24 pounds, and its length is about 2 feet exclusive of the tail. In many parts of England, and especially in Wales, the otter is hunted with dogs trained for this purpose. The other species of Lutra proper, which are found in different parts of the world, do not differ greatly from the European otter. The American otter is a quite distinct species, Lutra (Latax) canadensis. Some Asiatic otters with reduced claws constitute the genus Aonyx. There are South American otters, as Lutra brasiliensis and L. chilensis. The most remarkable form is the winged-tailed or margin-tailed otter of South America, Pteronura sandbachi. The fur of otters is valuable.

-ous. [ME. -ous, -ouse; < OF. -ous, -os, -us, -eus, later -eux, F. -eux = Sp. Pg. It. -oso, < L. -ōsus, for -onsus*, orig. (Aryan) -wansa*, -wanta*, a suffix (equivalent to E. -ful or -y[1] or -ed[2]) attached to nouns to form adjectives noting fullness, as in callosus, hard-skinned, callous, famosus, noted, famous, generosus, well-born, generous, odiosus, hateful, odious, religiosus, scrupulous, religious, sumptuosus, costly, sumptuous, vitiosus, faulty, vicious, etc.] A suffix of Latin origin, forming, from nouns, adjectives denoting fullness or abundance, or sometimes merely the presence, of the thing or quality expressed by the noun, as in callous, famous, generous, odious, religious, sumptuous, vicious, etc. (see etymology). Many modern English adjectives taken directly from the Latin have -ose, as jocose, verbose, with or without an equivalent form in -ous, as herbose herbous, onerose onerous, vinose vinous, spicose spicous, etc., the form in -ose being especially common in botanical terms. By reason of the agreement in the terminal pronunciation of English adjectives in -ous and the English pronunciation of Latin adjectives in -us (in Latin a mere nominative termination), many such adjectives in -us have been transferred into English with the accommodated termination -ous, as anxious, conspicuous, devious, obvious, previous, serious, etc., from Latin anxius, conspicuus, devius, obvius, prævius, serius, etc. So with Latin or New Latin adjectives in -us from Greek -os, as in acephalous, etc. The suffix -ous is felt as an English formative only when a noun accompanies the adjective, as in famous, odious, religious, ambitious, etc., associated with the nouns fame, odium, religion, ambition, etc. It is sometimes used (as also -ose), as an English formative, attached to words of non-Latin origin, as in quartzous or quartzose, etc.

outcrop (out′krop), n. The appearing at the surface of a stratum or series of strata, or of a vein or ore-deposit of any kind. This is called by Cornish miners the broil. The outcrops of many veins, on the other hand, are very conspicuous, especially when the amount of ore present is small, quartz forming the predominating vein-stone of a large proportion of the mineral deposits, and being very indestructible. The outcrops of the stratified formations depend on the amount of inclination of the beds. When these lie quite horizontal, there can be no outcropping edges of the strata, except when the formation has been cut into by erosion. The position on the surface of any outcrop depends, therefore, on the inclination of the bed or vein in question, and on the nature and amount of the erosion which has taken place. That part of a female animal in which ova, eggs, or germs are generated and matured; the essential female organ of reproduction, corresponding to the testes of the male; the female genital gland or germ-gland; the ovarium. In vertebrates the ovary is a glandular organ, usually paired, sometimes single, and morphologically identical with the testes, both these organs being developed from a primitively indifferent genital gland common to both sexes, the differentiation of this structure into ovary or testes being the fundamental distinction of sex upon which all other sexual differences are consequent. The ovary consists of its proper stroma or tissue peculiar to itself, in which the ova are produced, bound up in ordinary connective tissue, supplied with appropriate vessels or nerves, and fixed in the abdominal cavity by means of a mesentery. With the ovary is usually but not always associated a special structure, the oviduct, serving to convey away the eggs. The ovary is relatively largest in those animals which lay multitudinous eggs, as fishes, in which it is known as the roe. It is also large in oviparous animals which lay large meroblastic eggs with copious food-yolks, as birds and most reptiles. It is very small in mammals. The ovary in woman is a flattened ovoid body about 1½ inches long, ¾ inch wide, and ½ inch thick, resting on the broad ligament of the uterus and closely connected both with that organ and with the Fallopian tube or oviduct. Among invertebrates in which there is distinction of sex, the name ovary is applied to any part of the body which can be recognized as having the function of ovulation. Such organs are of almost endlessly varied character in all but the one essential physiological respect. Several kinds of ovaries receive specific names; and in many cases the analogy to the part of a plant called the ovary (see def. 2) is striking. See cuts under Dibranchiata and Nematoidea.

2. In bot., a closed case or receptacle, the lower section of the pistil, inclosing the ovules or young seeds, and ultimately becoming the fruit. Structurally the ovary is a modified leaf which is folded involutely so as to form a cavity, and with the style and stigma it constitutes the female sexual organs (gynœcium) of flowering plants. The ovary may be simple (that is, composed of a single leaf), or compounded of two or more leaves. The modified part of the interior of the ovary which bears the ovules is called the placenta (which see). The phrases superior and inferior ovary are used to designate the position of the ovary in relation to that of the floral envelops: thus, ovary superior is that in which the other parts of the flower are inserted upon the axis below the ovary; ovary inferior is that in which the other parts of the flower are inserted above, seemingly upon the ovary. See cuts under anthophore, Araceæ, Didynamia, dimerous, and myrtle.

Skt. ukhā, a pot; AS. ofnet, a closed vessel.]

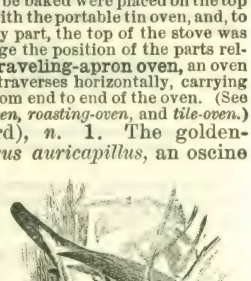
1. A chamber or receptacle in which food is cooked by the heat radiated from the walls, roof, or floor. (a) A chamber built of brick, tiles, or the like, and usually heated by fuel which is allowed to burn away before the food is introduced, the cooking being done by the heat retained. (b) A chamber for baking or cooking in a cooking-stove, range, or furnace, the heat being usually transmitted through one or more of the sides.

In steed of bread they drie a kind of fish which they beat in mortars to powder, and bake it in their ouens, vntill it be hard and drie.
Holinshed, Descrip. of Britain, I. x.



2. In general, any inclosed chamber adapted to or used for applying heat to raw materials or to articles in process of manufacture. The heat so applied may be radiated from the previously or continuously heated walls of the inclosure, or it may be derived from currents of heated air or gases or superheated vapors circulated through the oven, from interior or exterior coils of pipes heated by steam or hot water, or from the solar rays. The name oven is given to a great variety of structures and devices employed in domestic industry, in chemical operations, and in the mechanical arts. Specifically—(a) A kiln. (b) A muffle-furnace. (c) A leer.

3†. A furnace.

The king's servants, that put them in, ceased not to make the oven hot with rosin, pitch, tow, and small wood; so that the flame streamed forth above the furnace forty and nine cubits.
Song of the Three Holy Children (Apocrypha), v. 23.

4. An oven-bird or its nest.—Air-oven, an oven in which baking or drying is done by circulating heated air through it. It is much used in laboratories and in the arts. In some cases, as in drying gelatin plates for photography, the air is filtered on its way to the oven by passing it through cotton-wool. In air-ovens the air may be heated prior to its admission, or by interior heating appliances.—Annealing-oven, an oven used for annealing, as the leer of glass-manufactories for slowly cooling glass, which, if cooled rapidly, would be exceedingly brittle; or, as in the manufacture of malleable iron-castings, the inclosure in which the articles, after casting, are treated to render them malleable.—Bakers' oven, an oven used by bakers in baking bread, biscuits, crackers, and other articles of food. The principal oven still in use by bakers is a brick reverberatory oven with an arched roof; but in the manufacture of biscuits, crackers, wafers, etc., on a large scale reel ovens and rotary ovens are used.—Beehive oven. See beehive.—Brick oven, an oven constructed of brick, in contradistinction to an oven made of metal or other material. Brick ovens usually apply their heat from their walls previously heated by an interior fire, which is withdrawn prior to putting in the article to be baked. Such an oven for domestic use was once very common in dwellings, and was generally built at the side of or in close proximity to the chimney then in use. It often projected from the exterior of the building, and this construction is still to be seen in many old country houses. It has a smoke-uptake in the upper part of the mouth and a flue leading from the uptake, and connects at its upper end with the fireplace-chimney. Wood is the fuel used, and when the fire is kindled the air draws into the mouth and passes over the bottom of the oven, while the heated gases of combustion rise to the top and pass forward to the uptake.—Bush-oven, the long-tailed titmouse or oven-bird, Acredula rosea. [Norfolk, Eng.]—Drying-oven, an oven used for expelling moisture from substances or textures. The air-oven is the most generally used of this class. Drying-ovens heated to a point somewhat above the boiling-point of water, which expel water by converting it into steam, are also used for many purposes.—Dutch oven, a tin utensil for roasting meat, etc., closed at the sides, back, top, and bottom, and somewhat resembling in shape an open shed. The oven covers the joint or other article to be roasted on all sides except that facing the fire. (Also called kitchen or tin kitchen in the New England States and elsewhere.) The bake-kettle, a cast-iron vessel with a close-fitting convex cover upon which hot embers or coals are placed when the implement is used, is also sometimes called a Dutch oven.—Egyptian oven, a large earthen crock sunk in the ground, and heated by interior fire, which is removed to permit the baking of lumps of dough. These are thrown with force against the interior, and adhere thereto. The crock is then covered till the baking is finished. This is a very ancient form of oven, largely used in the East even to the present day.—Elevated oven, a range-oven situated higher than the fire-pot.—Heating-oven, an oven designed or used for simple heating, as in heating pieces of wood or other materials to be joined by glue or cement, or for heating vessels that must be used while hot; a hot-closet.—Out-oven, a domestic brick oven built by itself, apart from any building. Its construction is almost identical with that described under brick oven, except that it has a chimney extending straight upward over the mouth of the oven.—Reel oven, an oven in which the substances to be baked or dried are placed on swinging shelves attached to endless chains running on reels within a heated inclosure. The reels are turned at a velocity that permits the articles to be dried sufficiently, or baked completely, when the chain makes a complete circuit, which brings one of the swinging shelves on a level with the door of the oven. The finished articles are then removed from this shelf, and a new charge is put in their place. This discharging and recharging is successively performed for each shelf. Generally, ovens of this kind and rotary ovens are continuously heated by circulation of heated air through them, or by heated air through their walls, or by highly heated steam-coils.—Revolving oven, an oven in which the floor, or the shelves supporting the articles to be baked, etc., revolve horizontally or vertically. The articles are completely dried or baked in a single revolution, and are successively removed and replaced by new charges, as described under reel oven, which is an example of this kind of oven. In some ovens of this class a shaft with radial arms carrying swinging shelves rotates vertically in the heated inclosure. The manipulation and heating are as described under reel oven.—Rotary-hearth oven, an oven in which the floor or hearth revolves.—Rotary oven, an oven which can be horizontally rotated as a whole on a central pivot. Such ovens were formerly used with a form of kitchen stove called rotary stove. They were portable tin ovens made to fit the tops of the stoves, which were circular, and constructed to rotate on a central pivot. The top of the stove was toothed on the under side of its outer margin. The teeth were engaged by a small pinion operated by a crank. The articles to be baked were placed on the top of the stove, and covered with the portable tin oven, and, to prevent overheating of any part, the top of the stove was frequently turned to change the position of the parts relatively to the fire-pot.—Traveling-apron oven, an oven in which an endless belt traverses horizontally, carrying the articles to be baked from end to end of the oven. (See also coke-oven, porcelain-oven, roasting-oven, and tile-oven.)

oven-bird (uv′n-bėrd), n. 1. Many veritable overtures being successfully used as concert pieces, it is now customary to give the name to detached works for orchestra which are intended simply for concert use, though in such cases a special title is usually given to the composition.

An overture may proceed either from an inferior court or from one or more members of the court to which it is presented. In the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland (as in the supreme courts of most Presbyterian churches) legislative action is initiated by adopting an overture and sending it to presbyteries for their consideration. See the quotation.

Before the General Assembly passes any Acts which are to be binding rules and constitutions to the Church, . . . the same must be first proposed as an overture to the Assembly, and, being passed by them as such, be remitted to the consideration of the several Presbyteries of this Church, and their opinions and consent reported to the next General Assembly. . . . If returns . . . show that a majority of the Presbyteries approve, the overture as sent down may then be passed, and most frequently is passed, into an Act by the Assembly.

An oviduct exists in most vertebrates, and is usually paired, there being one to each ovary, but often single, the duct of one or the other side remaining undeveloped, as in birds. When well formed, as in birds and other animals which lay large eggs to be hatched outside the body, the oviduct is a musculomembranous tube or canal, of which one end is in relation with or applied to the ovary, and the other debouches in the cloaca, the tube being held in place by a special mesentery or mesometrium. In the course of the oviduct its mucous membrane acquires special characteristics, and secretes different substances; so that the ovum, escaping from the ovary as a ball of yellow yolk, becomes successively coated with white albumen, with a soft egg-pod, and finally, as in birds, with a hard chalky shell. The oviducts of the lowest mammals, which are oviparous, are of similar character; but in most mammals the pair of oviducts coalesce in the greater part of their length, whence result a single vagina and womb, with a pair of Fallopian tubes or oviducts in a restricted sense. A womb or uterus is simply a specialized part of an oviduct, where the ovum is detained long enough to be developed into a fetus and born alive. The oviducts of invertebrates, where any exist, are as diverse in character as the ovaries. See ovary[1], and cuts under Dendrocœla, Dibranchiata, Epizoa, and germarium.

It forms the end of the abdomen, several of the rings or somites of which are specially modified for this purpose. It normally or usually consists of three pairs of rhabdites, the outer two pairs of which incase or sheathe the inner pair, and form an extensile tube, of very variable size and shape in different insects. It is sometimes longer than the body of the insect. In the terebrant hymenopters the ovipositor forms a saw or an auger (serra or terebra). In the aculeate hymenopters, as bees and wasps, the ovipositor is the sting or aculeus. In orthopters it is often conspicuous, as seen in the cut. Also called oviscapt. See also cuts under canker-worm and Cecidomyia.—Exserted ovipositor. See exserted.

ovoviviparous (ō″vọ-vī-vip′a-rus), a. [< NL. ovoviviparus, < L. ovum, egg, + LL. viviparus, bringing forth alive: see viviparous.] Producing eggs which are hatched within the body of the parent but without placental attachment, so that the young are born alive, yet have not been developed in that direct connection with the blood-vessels of the mother which is characteristic of viviparous animals. Ovoviviparous animals are intermediate in this respect between oviparous and viviparous ones, whence the name. The process is a kind of internal incubation, but not a true gestation or pregnancy. It occurs in some fishes, many reptiles, some insects, as flesh-flies, various worms, and a great many other invertebrates. The carrying of eggs in any special receptacle about the body, from the time they leave the ovary until they hatch, is not true ovoviviparity. The implacental mammals, as marsupials, whose young are born very imperfect and then placed in a pouch, are sometimes wrongly called ovoviviparous.

ovulation (ō-vū-lā′shọn), n. [< ovulate, v., + -ion.] The formation or production of ova or ovules; also, a discharge of an ovum from the ovary. In women ovulation normally recurs thirteen times a year during the sexual life of the individual, and is accompanied by the phenomena of menstruation.

ovule (ō′vūl), n. [< F. ovule, < ML. ovulum, a little egg (NL. an ovule), dim. of L. ovum, egg: see ovum.] 1. A little egg; specifically, in anat., physiol., and zoöl., an ovulum or ovum, especially a small one, as that of a mammal, or one not yet matured and discharged from the ovary: specifically applied by Haeckel to the ovum or fertilizable but unfertilized egg-cell of the female, conformable with the use of spermule for the male sperm-cell. Its protoplasm is termed by him ovoplasm, and its nucleus ovococcus.—2. In bot., a young or rudimentary seed; a peculiar outgrowth or production of the carpel which, upon fertilization and the formation of an embryo within, becomes the seed. In the angiospermous gynœcium the ovules are normally produced along the margins, or some part of the margins, of the carpellary leaf, either immediately or by the intermediation of a placenta, which is a more or less evident development of the leaf-margins for the support of the ovules. Rarely ovules are developed from the whole internal surface of the ovary, or from various parts of it, in no definite order, directly from the walls, and without the intervention of anything which can be regarded as a placenta. In gymnosperms the ovules are borne on the face of the carpellary scale or at its base; or on metamorphosed leaf-margins, as in Cycas; or, when there is no representative of the carpel, on the cauline axis, seemingly as a direct growth of it. (Gray.) The essential part of the ovule is the nucellus, which contains the embryo-sac, and which is usually invested by one or two coats, the primine and secundine. The coats are sacs with a narrow orifice called the foramen, the closed vestige of which becomes the micropyle in the seed. The proper base of the ovule is the chalaza, and it may be either sessile or on a stalk (funiculus) of its own. The hilum is the scar left when the seed is detached from its funiculus. As to shape, ovules may be orthotropous, campylotropous, amphitropous, or anatropous; and as to position in the ovary, they may be erect, ascending, horizontal, pendulous, or suspended. In regard to numbers, they may be solitary, few, or indefinitely numerous. See cuts under accumbent, anatropous, funicle, magnolia, orthotropous, and ovary.

The shell is elongated, the ends of the lips being drawn out in some cases to such length that the resulting figure resembles a weaver's shuttle. Also rarely called Amphiperatidæ. Also Ovulinæ, as a subfamily of Cypræidæ. See cut under ovulum.

★ovum (ō'vum), n.; pl. ova (ō'vä). [L., = Gr. ᾠόν, an egg: see egg[1].] 1. An egg, in a broad biological sense; the proper product of an ovary; the female germ or seed, which when fertilized by the male sperm, and sometimes without such fecundation, is capable of developing into an individual like the parent. There is a great similarity in the ova of different animals throughout the metazoic series, from the sponge to the human being, no ova in their early stages being distinguishable from one another in their essential characters. All true ova, as distinguished from spores and products of fission or gemmation, are referable to the single morphological type of the cell; and they are furthermore indistinguishable from unicellular animals, and from many of the cells composing the bodies of the higher animals. An ovum consists of a quantity of protoplasm or cell-substance called the vitellus or yolk, inclosed in a cell-wall or vitelline membrane, and provided with a nucleus and usually a nucleolus; it is engendered in the ovarium, usually in an ovisac or so-called Graafian follicle, is discharged from its matrix, usually then meeting with the male element, and proceeds to develop within or without the body of the parent. The ovum proper, like most cells, is usually of microscopic size; but its bulk may be enormously increased by the addition of extrinsic or adventitious protoplasmic or albuminous substance, and it may be further protected by various kinds of egg-pod or egg-shell, all without losing its essential character as a cell. The largest ova, relatively and absolutely, are birds' eggs, these being by far the largest cells known in the animal kingdom. Here the quantity of food-yolk which does not undergo transformation into the body of the chick is out of all proportion to the formative yolk proper, which makes only a speck in the great ball of "yellow" and "white." Such ova are called meroblastic, in distinction from holoblastic. The human ovum is very minute, relatively and absolutely, averaging about $\frac{1}{250}$ of an inch in diameter. It is said to have been first recognized by K. E. von Baer in 1827. The parts of the ovum have been badly named, without reference to its morphology as a cell. Thus, the cell-wall is called the zona pellucida; the nucleus is named the germinal vesicle or vesicle of Purkinje, and its nucleolus the germinal spot or spot of Wagner. The phrases germinal vesicle and germinal spot are misleading. The first stages of development of an ovum, consequent upon fertilization, consist in the segmentation of the vitellus, or yolk-division, by which the cell-substance becomes a mulberry-mass of spherules, called the morula. The rest is an intricate process of differentiation and specialization of these spherules, and their multiplications into the myriads of different kinds of cells of which the whole body of most adult animals is fabricated. Some of the early special stages of this process are known as the morula, gastrula, blastula, etc. The first tissue or coherent layer of cells produced is called a blastoderm. When there are two layers, inner and outer blastodermic layers, they are distinguished as endoderm and ectoderm; when a third intermediate layer is formed, it is the mesoderm. An ovum is called, in general, a germ until the rudiments of its specific characters appear, when it becomes an embryo, and later may be a fetus. That department of ontology which treats of the development of the ovum is embryology. See cuts under diphyzoöid, gastrulation, gonophore, and ovotestis.

★owl[1] (oul), n. [< ME. owle, oule, ule, < AS. ūle = D. uil = MLG. ūle, LG. ūle = OHG. ūwila, ūla, hūwela, hiuwela, MHG. iuwel, iule, hūwel, hiuwel, G. eule = Icel. ugla = Sw. uggla = Dan. ugle, an owl; cf. OHG. hūwo, MHG. hūwe, ūwe, an owl; F. huette, an owl; L. ulula, an owl, Hind. hūhū, an owl, also a dove; all prob. orig. based on an imitation of the bird's cry, and thus remotely related to howl.] 1. A raptorial nocturnal bird of prey of the family Strigidæ. Owls constitute a highly monomorphic group, the suborder Striges of the order Raptores. With few exceptions, they are of distinctively nocturnal habits and a peculiar physiognomy produced by the great size and breadth of the head and the shortened face with large eyes looking forward and usually set in a facial ruff or disk of modified feathers, which hide the base of the bill. Many owls have also "horns" (that is, ear-tufts) or plumicorns. The bill is hooked, but never toothed, and the nostrils open at the edge of the cere, not in it. The plumage is very soft and blended, without aftershafts, and the flight is noiseless. The talons are large, sharp, and hooked as in other birds of prey; the outer toe is versatile; and the feet are usually feathered to the claws. (See cut under braceate.) There are many anatomical characters. (See Striges.) Owls are among the most nearly cosmopolitan of birds. They feed entirely upon animal substances, and capture their prey alive, as small quadrupeds and birds, various reptiles, fishes, and insects. They lay from three to six white eggs of subspherical shape. There are about 200 species, assigned to some 50 modern genera, and now usually considered as constituting 2 families, Strigidæ and Bubonidæ, or barn-owls and other owls. See cuts under barn-owl, Bubo, Glaucidium, hawk-owl, Nyctala, Otus, snow-owl, and Strix.

Shak., 3 Hen. VI., v. 6. 44.

And euen this did Adam seeke, if God had not brought him out of his Owles nest. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 26.

2. A variety of the domestic pigeon: so called from its owl-like physiognomy. The head is round, and the beak very short. There are several strains of owls, known as English, African, and Chinese. All run in various colors.

The owls are African, English, and Chinese. The African is at home in Tunis, whence many thousands have been sent to England, and of which scarcely dozens remain. The bird is the smallest of the family, and so delicate that its term of life out of African air is very limited. The English owl is fair in size, with eye round and prominent, the dewlap well developed, and the frill extending to the lower point of the breast. In the Chinese this frill-feathering is excessive, even extending up about the throat to the eyes. The Century, XXXII. 107.

3. A person whose pleasure or business it is to be up or about much at night. [Colloq.]—An owl in an ivy-bush†, a stupid, blundering fellow.

The several animals of this kind have each of them specific designations, as buffalo, bison, aurochs, zebu, musk-ox, etc.: the word is commonly restricted to the varieties of Bos taurus, the common ox, which is one of the most valuable of domestic animals. Its flesh is the principal article of animal food, and there is scarcely any part of the animal that is not useful to mankind: the skin, the horns, the bones, the blood, the hair, and the refuse of all these, have their separate uses. Having been specially domesticated by man from a stock which it is probably impossible to trace, the result has been the formation of very many breeds, races, or permanent varieties, some of which are valued for their flesh and hides, some for the richness and abundance of their milk, while others are in great repute for both beef and milk. Among the first class may be mentioned the Durham or shorthorn, the polled Aberdeen or Angus, and the West Highland or kyloe. Among the most celebrated for dairy purposes are the Jersey, Guernsey, Holstein-Friesian, Ayrshire, and Suffolk dun. For the purposes both of the dairy-farmer and of the grazier, the Hereford and a cross between a shorthorn and an Ayrshire are much fancied. The ox is used in many parts of the world as a beast of draft. The "wild ox," now surviving in only a few parks, as at Chillingham Park in Northumberland, and at Cadzow Forest in Lanarkshire, is probably not a descendant of the true wild ox but has been derived from cattle introduced into Britain by the Romans.

An element discovered by Priestley in 1774, who called it dephlogisticated air. It was finally called oxygen by Lavoisier, because supposed to be present in all acids. Further investigation, however, has proved that this is not the case. Oxygen is a chemical element existing as a permanent gas, colorless, odorless, and tasteless, and somewhat heavier than atmospheric air. It is soluble in water, which at a temperature of 60° F. dissolves $\frac{1}{130}$ of its volume of oxygen. Oxygen combines very readily with most of the elements, and forms oxids with all except fluorin and bromine. The act of combination is so energetic in many cases as to evolve light and heat, the phenomena of combustion. In other cases, as in the tarnishing or rusting of metals and the decay of animal or vegetable substances, oxidation takes place so slowly that, while the result is the same, the heat evolved at one time is not enough to produce luminous effects or even to be sensible. Free or uncombined oxygen is essential to all animal and vegetable life. Animal heat and muscular energy are results of a slow combustion produced in all parts of the system by oxygen carried in the blood from the lungs. In sunlight oxygen is exhaled by growing plants, but a certain quantity is assimilated and is essential to life. Oxygen is the most widely distributed and abundant element in nature; it constitutes about one fifth of the total volume of the atmosphere, which is a mechanical mixture of oxygen and nitrogen with small amounts of other substances. Water contains about 89 per cent. of it by weight, and it is found in most animal and vegetable products, acids, bases, and salts. The rocks which make up most of the earth's crust contain very nearly 50 per cent. of oxygen. Under certain conditions oxygen may be made to pass into an allotropic or condensed form called ozone.

It was Lavoisier who gave to this curious kind of air or gas the name of Oxygen, by which it is now universally known; and it was he, too, who first showed, by the most conclusive experiments, what was really the composition of atmospheric air. His determination of the constitution of the air was made in the year 1777.

A Fossil Oyster, Ostrea longirostris.

Ostreidæ, such as Ostrea edulis, the common species of Europe, and O. virginica, that of the Atlantic coast of the United States. The species are very numerous, and are found in all temperate and tropical countries, in salt and brackish water; there are also many fossil species. The shell is very irregular, both inequivalve and inequilateral, with one valve flattened and the other more concavo-convex, both rough outside and nacreous inside. Each valve has one purplish eye or spot, showing where the single adductorial muscle is attached, oysters being thus monomyarian. The gristly button-shaped body in the flesh is this ligament. The soft greenish substance corresponds to a liver. The fluted layers around a part of the body are the gills or breathing-organs. Oysters have sex, and are very prolific. They spawn in north temperate countries in May and June, during which period and for some time afterward they are not so good for food; whence the common saying that oysters are not eatable in those months which have no r in their names. The spawn or fry is called spat or spet. Oysters are now very extensively cultivated, the resulting stock being superior to the natural oyster. Starfishes and some carnivorous gastropods (see borer) are among the great obstacles to success with which oyster-culture has to contend. Oysters feed upon a great many different aquatic organisms of minute size. In confinement they eat corn-meal greedily. See cuts under ciborium, integropalliate, and Ostrea.

[Slang.]—A choking or stopping oyster†, a reply that leaves one nothing to say, as if choked with an oyster too large to swallow.

At an other season, to a feloe laiyng to his rebuke that he was ouer deintie of his mouthe and diete, he did with this reason giue a stopping oistre.

They are commonly called Blue Points, and the name is popularly but wrongly supposed to refer to the large dark-bluish "eye" on the inside of the shell. These oysters are of small size, but very delicate and well-flavored.—Box oyster, an oyster from seven to ten years old, of handsome round shape, not less than three inches wide and five inches long. It is the second grade in the New York market, inferior to Saddlerock, and superior to cullings and bushel oysters. The name is due to the fact that they used to be shipped in boxes instead of barrels. [Connecticut and New York.]—Bushel oysters, oysters of inferior quality, sold by the bushel. Also called Capes. [Boston, Massachusetts.]—Cat's-tongue oyster, a very narrow and elongated oyster. They have many fanciful local names.—Reef-oyster, an oyster growing naturally on reefs; a reefer. [Alabama to Texas.]—Saddlerock oyster, the first or largest grade of oysters in the New York market. The oysters that first bore that name were taken from a rock so called in Little Neck Bay, Long Island, the supply from which was soon exhausted.—Sand-oysters, oysters which have been scattered and exposed or damaged on sand-shoals; sanded oysters.—Shrewsbury oysters, oysters from Shrewsbury river, New Jersey.—Single oyster, an oyster which becomes detached from the bunches after two years' growth; hence, a grown or merchantable oyster.—Soft oyster, the oyster obtained from the Chesapeake and southward: distinguished from the hard or native northern oyster.—Thorny oysters, bivalves of the genus Spondylus.—Tonged oysters, oysters taken with the tongs: they are preferred to those which are dredged.—Vegetable oyster. Same as oyster-plant, 2.—Wild oyster, an oyster of natural growth, neither artificially propagated nor transplanted.—Window oysters, the Placunidæ. See cut under Placuna. In the normal soul there is now an outcrop of the same psychic strata which once created and gave life and sacredness to lustrations, baptisms, oracles, water deities, philosophemes like those of Thales, who made water the source of all things, or of Heraclitus, who saw in vapor, water, and ice the key to the universe which was constantly fluxing up or down the long way of rarefication and condensation between ether and rock. hygrometer, n.—Dufour's hygrometer, a porous diaphragm through which the vapor diffuses at a rate which varies with the difference of the elastic vapor pressures on either side of the diaphragm. The air within the diaphragm is kept saturated. Schidlofski modified this by using a metallic vessel containing water and having a porous cap over the opening, and a similar vessel containing air that is dried by a chemical absorbent. The differential rate of diffusion is the basis of the calculation of relative humidity.—Edelmann's hygrometer, a hygrometer which determines the tension or volume of the vapor present in a gaseous form, without taking account of any particles of fog that may be present in the atmosphere.—Hair-hygrometer, an instrument for the measurement of humidity in which the influence of moisture upon the length of a hair is used. A human hair, freed from fat by treatment with alkali, is suspended vertically. The lower end passes around a pulley, to which a pointer is attached, and is held taut by means of a weight. In moist air the hair absorbs water and increases in length. Changes of length, indicative of variations in the humidity of the surrounding atmosphere, cause a rotary movement of the pointer along a circular scale.—Mason's hygrometer, the wet-and-dry bulb or psychrometer as arranged by Mason, now replaced by the whirled, sling, or ventilated psychrometer.—Renoux-Matern hygrometer, a hygrometer which determines the deficit of tension or the quantity of water-vapor needed in order to saturate a given space, whence follows the quantity that was already present.—Trouton's electrical dew-point hygrometer, an apparatus in which the deposit of the slightest film of moisture on a polished metallic surface is announced by the completion of the electric circuit through the dew.—Trouton's gravimetric recording hygrometer, an apparatus in which the weight of a hygrometric body with its varying amount of moisture is recorded by an inked stylus on a revolving drum of graduated paper. The weight is assumed to vary with the hygrometric state or relative humidity of the atmosphere.

The larvæ of the host and of the parasite are thus both in that state of somnolence which I have called "hypnodie"; on the other hand, the chrysalis of the former and the nymph of the latter are both active and capable of developing the most extraordinary energy in order to escape from their prison.
Annals and Mag. Nat. Hist., Oct., 1904, p. 311.

hypnoidization (hip-noi-di-zā′shọn), n. [hypnoid + -ize + -ation.] A method of inducing light hypnosis. See the extract.

The method which I term hypnoidization . . . consists in the following procedure: The patient is asked to close his eyes and keep as quiet as possible, without, however, making any special effort to put himself in such a state. He is then asked to attend to some stimulus, such as reading or singing. When the reading is over, the patient, with his eyes still shut, is asked to repeat it, and tell what came into his mind during the reading, during the repetition, or after it. Sometimes . . . the patient is simply asked to tell the nature of ideas and images that entered into his mind at that time or soon after. This method, simple as it is, I find to work wonders, especially in cases of amnesia. B. Sidis, Psychol. of Suggestion, p. 224.

hypobenthos (hī-pō-ben′thos), n. [NL., < Gr. ὑπό, under, + βένθος, depth (see benthos*).] The animals that live upon or in the bottom of the deep sea, below the 500-fathom line, considered collectively: contrasted with the epibenthos, or fauna and flora of the bottom in shallow water, and the mesobenthos, or the inhabitants of the bottom between 100 and 500 fathoms; the abyssal benthos. One of the most remarkable results of the exploration of the deep sea is the discovery that the bottom, even under more than five miles of water, supports a rich fauna of characteristic animals, living under conditions which had long been supposed to be incompatible with life. Their bodies support a pressure which, in the greatest depths, is more than five tons to the square inch, and they live in water that is always near the freezing-point, in total darkness except for the light which they themselves produce by means of luminous organs. Since plants are completely absent in the depths, the only ultimate source of the food of these animals is the rain of dead plants and animals which is constantly falling upon them from the higher levels. See ★benthos, ★epibenthos, ★mesobenthos.

In this zone, which extends from about 500 fathoms to the greatest depths (which may in some cases exceed 5,000 fathoms, or more than 5½ miles), the temperature at any given point is uniform throughout the year. The darkness is probably absolute; for food the animals are dependent upon each other and upon the incessant rain of dead plankton from higher levels; the pressure may be anything between half a ton and five tons per square inch. To the fauna which lives in these remarkable circumstances the name hypobenthos may be applied.

It is an important component of the vertebræ in the extinct Stegocephala. By some authorities the chevron-bones of mammals are considered as developed from the hypocentra.—Hypocentrum arcuale, an arched band of bone on the under, ventral, side of the notochord, formed by the union of two arcualia: the basiventralia of Gadow.—Hypocentra pleuralia, a pair of bony plates, or arcualia, which lie on the under side of the notochord behind the hypocentrum arcuale: the 'interventralia' of Gadow. hypothesis, n.—Difference, filar, glacial hypothesis. See ★difference, etc.—Meteoritic hypothesis, the theory (of late specially elaborated, though not originated, by Sir Norman Lockyer), that the nebulæ consist of swarms of meteorites, and that stars and systems have been formed by the slow aggregation of these bodies. It is in contrast with the nebular hypothesis of Laplace, which presupposed an original mass of heated gas. Professor George Darwin has shown that in the long run such a meteoritic assemblage would behave in most respects like a gaseous mass contracting under its own gravitation, first rising in temperature to a maximum and then cooling after solidification. According to the meteoritic hypothesis the light of nebulæ is explained by the collisions between the meteors, and the bright lines that characterize the distinctly gaseous spectra of many nebulæ are attributed to gases liberated from the meteors themselves by these collisions, possibly illuminated by electric discharges, no general high temperature of the nebula being required. The theory finds plausible applications in explaining the phenomena of temporary (novæ) and variable stars, as due to the encounter of two or more such meteoritic clouds.—Planetesimal hypothesis. See ★planetesimal.—Prout's hypothesis, in phys. chem., the hypothesis, put forward by William Prout in 1815 and 1816, that the atomic weights of the elements are multiples by whole numbers of the atomic weight of hydrogen —from which follows an obvious suggestion as to the relation of different elements to each other. It was shown that chlorin by no means agrees with the hypothesis, and the hypothesis was modified so as to assert that atomic weights are integral multiples of the half or of the fourth part of the atomic weight of hydrogen; this experimentation has disproved. It is possible to put smaller and smaller fractions in place of one half and one fourth, but the point is quickly reached where experiment cannot decide whether the suggested numbers are correct or not, and the new hypothesis ceases to be verifiable; so that Prout's hypothesis has failed to be of any direct service in revealing the nature of matter.—Suess's hypothesis, the hypothesis of Edward Suess, of Vienna, in explanation of the large inequalities of the earth's surface. It involves the conception that certain portions, called by Suess horsts (see ★horst), early acquired a marked stability and solidity, and that against these as buttresses, the remainder were crowded in the contraction of the globe.—Working hypothesis, a hypothesis suggested or supported in some measure by features of observed facts, from which consequences may be deduced which can be tested by experiment and special observations, and which it is proposed to subject to an extended course of such investigation, with the hope that, even should the hypothesis thus be overthrown, such research may lead to a tenable theory.

It is of very great importance in alternating magnetic fields of transformers, electric generators, etc. Magnetic hysteresis is closely proportional to the 1.6 power of magnetic induction. See magnetic ★circuit. The hysteresis loop, or magnetic loop, is a closed curve, a, b, c, d, which represents the changes in magnetic induction (B) in a piece of iron or steel when the magnetizing force (H) is progressively varied in intensity and direction. ice-hockey (īs′hok″i), n. A game, developed from field-hockey, played on ice, either on open ponds or in rinks. It is usually specified that the rink shall be at least 112 feet long by 58 feet wide. A team is composed of 7 men, 4 forwards or rushers, who carry the attack, and 3 others, called cover-point, point, and goal-keeper, whose work is principally defensive, although the cover-point often backs up or 'feeds' the rushers or forwards. The ice-surface for this game may vary in length or breadth. If played in a rink, goals are erected at either end and the surface is bounded by planking 2 feet or more in height. The sticks which the players use are made of ash, curved at the end; the curved part is formed into a blade less than 13 inches in length and 3 in width, which rests upon the surface of the ice, allowing about a foot of the stick upon the ice. The puck, as it is called, is a disk of vulcanized rubber 3 inches in diameter and 1 in thickness, which is slid along the ice, although it can be lifted by a wrist motion so as to fly through the air. Two halves of 20 minutes each constitute the time of play, with an intermission of 10 minutes. The game is started by facing the puck in the center of the field of play. This consists in placing the puck on the middle point of the field between the sticks of two opposing center forwards. The referee calls play, and each man then strives to gain possession of the puck and pass it to players of his own side. The forwards are usually divided into two centers and two wings, and the puck is shot diagonally across the surface from one player to another. The players use both hands on the stick, and a good player rarely resorts to a one-hand use of the stick. No player is allowed to raise his stick above the shoulder. The puck may be advanced by the use of the stick, but it may be stopped by the skate or the body. The goal-tender stands between the goal-posts, and the rule provides that he must not lie, sit, or kneel upon the ice, but must maintain a standing position. His play consists in defending the goal and shooting the puck off from one side to the other when the goal is in danger. There is a referee who has charge of the play: two goal-umpires, one at each end, decide whether the puck passes through the goal. Rules for off- and on-side play prevail in hockey; that is, a player must always be on his own side of the puck, and is off-side if he is nearer the opponents' goal-line than the player of his own team who last hit the puck, in which event he is not allowed to touch it or interfere or obstruct an opponent until again on-side. He is put on-side when the puck has been touched by an opponent, or when he has skated behind one of his own side who either has possession of the puck or played it last when behind the offender. Body-checking, blocking, and interfering when on-side are allowed. Charging from behind, tripping, collaring, kicking, and cross-checking are not allowed. The final result is determined by the number of goals scored in the two halves.

id (id), n. [G. id (Weismann, suggested by idioplasm), ⟨ Gr. ἰδιος, own, proper, peculiar: see idiot.] In Weismann's doctrine of germ-plasm, the substance of inheritance or the bearer (a), in the germ-plasm, of the hereditary qualities of a single complete organism, or (b), in the somatic idioplasm of the hereditary qualities of a group of cells or a part of a developing embryo or growing organism. The term is used therefore with two meanings—to designate the bearer of the hereditary qualities of the ancestral idioplasm, or germ-plasm, which may give rise to a new and complete organism, and to designate the bearer of the hereditary qualities of the idioplasm of successive stages in the development and growth of the organism that arises from the egg. The id of this somatic idioplasm is held to be at first identical with that of the germ-plasm, but to become broken up into simpler and simpler ids as development advances. See idioplasm, doctrine of ★germ-plasm.

The supposed function of the ids as the bearers of hereditary qualities in fertilization.
Encyc. Brit., XXVII. 335.

Heterologous id, in Weismann's doctrine of germ-plasm, one of the ids which are the bearers of the hereditary qualities of groups of cells which are not homologous.—Homologous id, in Weismann's doctrine of germ-plasm, one of the ids which are the bearers of the hereditary qualities of homologous groups of cells. Weismann (trans.), Germ-plasm, p. 265.

-id[1]. 2. This termination is to be given to the relatively electronegative constituent of a compound: as, hydrogen oxid (not oxygen hydrid), calcium sulphid (not sulphur calcid).

-id[2]. 2. This termination affords a simple and regular method of transforming a family name ending in -idæ into a common 'English' noun serving as a name for any member of the family. Thus, any member of the Felidæ is a felid, any of the Bradypodidæ a bradypodid, any of the Gadidæ a gadid, etc. This overcomes the ambiguity of using the popular name of some member of the family as a common name for all. The popular name is often not conterminous in meaning with the New Latin name and it always has a set of cross associations that are absent from the New Latin name. The two kinds of names do not cover the same ground. Every member of the Bradypodidæ is a sloth, but not every member of the Gadidæ is a cod, as several other well-known fishes, such as the pollack and haddock, are members of that family.

3. A termination used by Osborn to designate the cusps of the lower teeth: for example, the cusp on a lower molar that corresponds to the hypocone of an upper tooth is the hypoconid, etc.

Ida. An abbreviation of Idaho.

Idæan, a.—The Idæan mother, the goddess Cybele, who had her sanctuary on Mount Ida.

idant (id′ant), n. [id + -ant.] 1. A group of ids or bearers of the hereditary qualities of an individual organism in the germ-plasm or substance of inheritance. Weismann holds the conception of the idant, or group of ids, to be necessary to account for the production of germ-cells in the body of an organism developed from a single id. In asexual organisms all the ids in an idant are supposed to be alike, but different in organisms that have long multiplied by sexual reproduction, so that the children of the same parents are not commonly identical. See ★Weismannism, doctrine of ★germ-plasm.

In the first place, the mass of germ-plasm which is the starting-point of a new individual consists of several, sometimes of many, pieces named "idants," which are the chromosomes, into a definite number of which the nuclear material of a dividing cell breaks up. These idants are a collection of "ids," which Weismann tentatively identifies with the microsomata contained in the chromosomes. Encyc. Brit., XXIX. 256, 257.

2. Figuratively used in sociology to designate certain naturally selected individuals of differing classes or races, who seek each other in reproduction, and so create a new stock, as idants (chromatic bodies) in the reproduction cell do in biological reproduction. L. F. Ward, Pure Sociology, p. 208.

idea, n.—Dominant idea, in psychol., an imperative or insistent idea; an idea that dominates or besets the mind, in spite of all effort to inhibit it and in spite of one's assurance of its unreasonable character.

There is no end to the strange performances which may be thus called forth; but they are all referable to the one simple principle already laid down as the characteristic of this state, the possession of the mind by a dominant idea. W. B. Carpenter, Mental Physiol., p. 556.

Extensive idea, in psychol., a temporal or spatial idea.

Spatial and temporal ideas are immediately distinguished from intensive ideas by the fact that their parts are united . . . in a definitely fixed order . . . Ideas with such a fixed arrangement are called in general extensive ideas. W. Wundt (trans.), Outlines of Psychol., p. 102.

Fixed idea. (a) A delusional idea or train of thought which dominates the mind in certain forms of insanity; a monomania. It [the investigation] has denied the existence in animal consciousness of any important stock of free ideas or impulses, and so has denied that animal association is homologous with the association of human psychology.
E. L. Thorndike, Animal Intelligence, p. 108.

Imperative idea. (a) A persistent or obsessing idea or train of thought which the subject cannot banish or escape, though he recognizes its falsity or triviality. Imperative ideas exist in all degrees of intensity, from the tune that 'runs in the head' to such obsessions as agoraphobia. (b) Same as fixed ★idea (a).—Implicit idea, in psychol., the idea or group of ideational elements that fuses with the presentation in the act of perception; the ideational associate that raises a datum of sensation to the rank of perception. Höffding

It [the idea] is, so to say, embryonic, something additional to the mere sensation assimilated, and yet something less than a "free or independent idea." It is, as it has been happily called, a tied (gebundene) or implicit idea. Encyc. Brit., XXXII. 59.

Insistent idea. Same as imperative ★idea.—Intensive idea, in Wundt's psychology, a combination of sensational elements, in which the order of the elements may be indefinitely varied. W. Wundt (trans.), Outlines of Psychol., p. 93.—Musical idea. See idea, 9, and ★metamorphosis, 5.—Secondary idea, in Wundt's psychology, any idea successively associated with the assimilation which forms the core of mediate recognition or the starting-point of an associative train.

The principal idea may be assimilated first, the secondary ideas coming later as revivals of earlier experiences; this is a case of 'association by contiguity.'
W. Wundt (trans.), Human and Animal Psychol., p. 305.

Ideational type. Same as ★memory type. E. B. Titchener, Exper. Psych., I. i. 195.—Ideational unity, in Wundt's psychology, the principle in accordance with which the sensations aroused at a given moment are not perceived as a mere medley, but are associated to form ideas, which are then set in temporal and spatial relations; the principle which, under certain abnormal conditions of stimulation, leads in the case of vision to the phenomena of luster and ideational rivalry. W. Wundt (trans.), Human and Animal Psychol., pp. 204, 217.

When the mixture is of constant quality the ignition can be properly timed by the fact that the mixture will ignite at a certain point of compression in contact with a hot surface. When the mixture varies in volume or weight with varying loads a timing-valve system must be used. No such variation is possible as with electric ignitions in which ignition may be retarded and advanced relatively to the dead-point of the piston-travel.—Jablochkoff igniter, the bit of conducting material between the terminals of a Jablochkoff candle which serves to carry the current when the candle is first put in circuit, and which, by burning away, establishes the arc.—Jump-spark igniter, an igniter in which the electric spark from an induction-coil is made to jump between fixed terminals. Sci. Amer., Jan. 17, 1903.—Make-and-break igniter, an igniter for explosion-engines, in which the terminals between which the spark is to pass are automatically brought together and separated during each cycle. *Sci. igniter-lead (ig-nī′tėr-lēd), n. That which determines the time, in the cycle of an explosion-engine, at which ignition shall occur. Sci. Amer., Nov. 29, 1902.

ignition, n. 5. In internal-combustion motors, the setting fire to the mixture of air and hydrocarbon vapor in the cylinder, so that the air shall expand and increase its pressure and perform the work required. Ignition is mainly effected, in modern motors, by an electric spark which jumps across a gap between terminals and in so doing raises the temperature of the mixture to the igniting-point. Such electric ignition may be by the jump-spark system, or by the make-and-break system. In the jump-spark system, the terminals on the secondary circuit of a Ruhmkorff or induction-coil are used. The current is made and broken on the primary or battery circuit, and this sends a secondary current of high intensity through the secondary line, in which are the gap-terminals. The primary make-and-break effect may be either by mechanical or by electrical vibrators, timed at will by the revolution of the motor-shaft. The hammer-break or arc system ignites by causing a flowing primary current to be mechanically interrupted by the separation of two contacts in the circuit. The current arcs across the break until the gap becomes too wide and the arc sets fire to the mixture around it. The make-and-break gives a 'fat' or copious spark, but considerable battery-power is needed; the jump-spark gives a tenuous high-tension spark, with less battery-power. Magneto-electric machines or small dynamos are much used for electric ignitions. Ignition may also be effected by compressing the mixture and at the right time allowing it to enter a hot tube of refractory material heated to redness by an exterior flame; or simple compression within the hot walls of the containing-chamber will fire an easily ignited mixture.—Advanced ignition, the ignition which is made to take place while the piston is at some distance from the end of the compressing-stroke, or before the crank has reached its dead-center.—Automatic ignition, that method of igniting the compressed combustible mixture of fuel and air behind the piston of an internal-combustion motor in which the fuel is ignited by raising the temperature by the compression in the heated cylinder so that the mixture takes fire without a flame or spark. (See ★ignition, 5.) It is objectionable in that the cold combustion- or mixture-chamber must be preheated to start, and that under variable loads and variable charges ignition is uncertain and explosive charges may either escape into the exhaust-piping, or be pre-ignited.—Ignition timing, the act or process of so timing the ignition that it will take place at a certain instant; specifically, in a gas-engine, the timing of the ignition to take place when the piston is at a certain point in its travel.—Retarded ignition, ignition which is made to take place after the crank has passed the dead-center and the compressed mixture has begun to expand in volume. See ★ignition, 5. The spark is usually retarded in starting the engine. To advance or to retard on either side of the most advantageous angle is to diminish the power of the working-stroke.—Temperature of ignition, the lowest temperature at which a substance will burn or enter into combination, usually with the oxygen of the air, with production of heat and light. Very commonly the substance needs to be heated to attain this temperature, but in some cases the ignition-point is at or below the common temperature of the air, so that the substance takes fire as soon as it comes in contact with air. Such substances are said to be spontaneously combustible. Roscoe and Schorlemmer, Treatise on Chem., I. 228.

illumination, n. 1. Specifically, the measure of the amount of light falling on a surface. The illumination of a surface is proportional to the intensity of the source of light producing it, and it varies inversely as the square of the distance between the source and the illuminated surface. The unit of illumination is the lux, the illumination produced by a source of light having an intensity of one hefner and situated at a distance of one meter from the illuminated surface. Illumination is sometimes expressed in candle-meters (also written meter-candles), the candle-meter being the illumination produced by a standard candle at a distance of one meter. In countries where the standard candle has been defined as equal to the hefner, the candle-meter is the same as the lux. In those countries where British units still prevail, the unit of illumination is the candle-foot (also foot-candle), the illumination produced by a British standard candle at a distance of one foot. One candle-foot equals 12.2 luxes. The total flux of light from a given source is expressed in lumens, the lumen being the flux of light in a beam which subtends one unit of solid angle, the intensity of the source being one hefner. Since the unit solid angle subtends one square centimeter at a radius of one centimeter, the lux is the illumination produced by one lumen of light-flux per square centimeter of surface. Since the primary object of artificial lighting is to produce illumination, the establishment of a unit such as the lux, by means of which the illumination can be definitely measured and expressed, is of great importance in photometry. Instruments employed for the measurement of the intensity of the sources of light are called photometers. Any special form of photometer used for the direct determination of illumination is called a luminometer (sometimes written illuminometer). The illumination produced by different sources of artificial light under like conditions varies through a wide range. The following table gives results of the comparison of the light-sources commonly used in the projecting lantern, determined by measurement of the illumination received upon a screen.

Source of light.	Lumens of flux.
Petroleum flame	3.79
Acetylene flame	20.82
Lime (freshly ignited)	56.71
Lime (old)	16.65
Electric arc, alternating 550 watts	330.00
Electric arc, direct carbons parallel 550 watts	464.80
Electric arc, direct carbons at 90° 550 watts	700.00
Electric arc, direct carbons at 154° 500 watts	921.60

The amount of energy necessary to produce an illumination of one lux varies with the temperature of the source of light and with the character of the radiating surface. The art of artificial illumination consists in furnishing the requisite amount of light of suitable color at the place where illumination is required. To fulfil these conditions it is requisite to know the illumination adequate for a given purpose in definite measure: for reading and writing, for example, it is found that the minimum illumination of the page permissible varies from 5 to 50 luxes, according to the size of the type and the character of the paper. For each purpose for which artificial light is used there is a proper illumination, and only when this is definitely known may methods of precision be applied.

illuminator, n.—Monochromatic illuminator, in optics, a device for isolating an approximately monochromatic region of the spectrum and concentrating the rays thus obtained.—Vertical illuminator, an apparatus accessory to a microscope which adapts it to the observation of opaque objects. A simple form consists of a cover-glass mounted at an angle of 45° in a nose-piece placed between the objective and the body-tube. Light admitted through a side aperture is reflected from the cover-glass through the lenses of the objective upon the object under examination. The light is then reflected back in a vertical beam through the objective and the cover-glass to the eyepiece. This attachment is indispensable for the examination of metals in metallography.

illusion, n. 2. In recent years, much attention has been devoted by experimental psychologists to the phenomena of optical illusion, more particularly to the group known as the geometrical optical illusions. Although it is impossible, at the present time, to offer any final classification of these illusions, the following list may be regarded as fairly complete. (1) Illusions of reversible perspective. There are certain figures, of the sort represented by Schroeder's stair figure (which see, under ★figure), which are capable of two or more perspective interpretations. It is characteristic of these figures that, as one looks at them, the shift of perspective occurs spontaneously and at irregular intervals. The figures are best drawn in white lines on a black background, the black affording a roominess or spaciousness which favors the perspective effect. Two further examples are here given. Fig. 1 may be seen either as a square box resting upon the ground, or as a block projecting upwards and to the left from the plane of the paper; Fig. 2 may be seen with the lower plane nearer or farther than the upper. (2) Illusions of extent. These are of two kinds, variable and constant. Typical of the former is the Müller-Lyer figure (which see, under ★figure). Further examples are given in Figs. 3 and 4. Although the dimensions in these figures are objectively equal, the filled spaces appear larger than the open. Typical of the latter are the illusions embodied in Fig. 5, where, in spite of objective equality, the vertical line seems longer than the horizontal, and the upper half of the vertical longer than the lower. (3) Illusions of direction. These, like the illusions of extent, may be variable or constant. Instances of the former class have been given under ★figure (Hering's and Wundt's ★figures; Münsterberg's ★figure; Poggendorff's ★figure; Zöllner's ★figure). Typical of the latter class is Von Recklinghausen's illusion, shown in Fig. 6. If the figure is held a short distance from the eye, and its center steadily fixated, the hyperbolas become straight lines, so that the figure resembles a chess-board. (4) Illusions of association. These have been subdivided as assimilative and contrastive. Fig. 7 shows an assimilative illusion: the lines of the lower part of the figure appear larger than those of the upper. Fig. 8 shows a contrastive illusion: the space between the narrow rectangles appears wider than that between the broader. (5) Mixed illusions, derived from a complication of the above conditions. Thus in Fig. 9 there is a variable illusion of direction: the smaller arc seems to belong to a circle of greater radius than the larger arc. There is also an illusion of assimilation: the larger and smaller arcs are referred to the same center. This class of illusions is, naturally, very wide. Finally (6), we may perhaps add, since by certain theorists they are connected with the geometrical optical illusions, the group of visual illusions of movement, one of which has been described under the term ★antirrheoscope. Explanations of these illusions range, as explanations of such phenomena always have ranged, between the two poles of physiology and psychology. Some investigators make them entirely a matter of perception, conditioned upon the structure and function of the sense-organ; they work with such factors as the nature of the retinal image, the direction of fixation, the movements of the eye. They point out, for instance, that reversal of perspective in class 1 can always be brought about by a shift of fixation, and that the spontaneous reversals noticed in ordinary observation are invariably connected with such shift, unconsciously made. They point out, again, that the extension and contraction of the lines in the Müller-Lyer figure may very well depend upon furtherance and arrest of eye-movement, according to the direction of the oblique end-pieces. Others, on the contrary, appeal, if not outright to such mental faculties as 'will' and 'imagination,' at any rate to purely psychological conditions; they make the illusions a matter not of perception but of judgment and association. The Müller-Lyer lines lengthen and shorten with the nature of the end-pieces because we read our own mechanical activities into the figure, feel ourselves in it as free or as constrained: eye-movements, save possibly as the vehicle by which these activities, efforts, and tensions come to expression, have nothing to do with the illusion. Between these extremes lie various forms of mixed interpretation; and it may be said definitely that, in the present state of our knowledge, recourse must be had for explanation both to physiology and to psychology. The illusions of class 4 have never been accounted for in physiological terms; while, conversely, the most ardent champions of the judgment theory cannot deny the influence of fixation in the illusions of class 1. Nor is there any reason for regarding the one mode of explanation as more 'scientific' than the other. The illusions have, admittedly, a physiological substrate: the question is only whether this substrate is altogether peripheral, given with the structure and function of the eyes, or is in part central, depending on connections within the cerebral cortex. The study of the optical illusions, if it has not as yet enabled us to decide this question, has at any rate brought to light a large body of interesting facts as well as a long list of possibilities of explanation; it has helped to illuminate various vexed problems in the perception of visual space; and it has thus cleared the ground for a future synthetic survey of space psychology.

immunity, n. 5. In pathol., a lack or absence of susceptibility to disease. This may be either natural or acquired. Natural immunity may be of the most varied character. Thus it is found that animals are altogether insusceptible to many diseases which are common in man, such as yellow fever, smallpox, scarlet fever, measles, etc.; the cold-blooded animals, as a class, are free from many diseases which are common in the warm-blooded animals; birds and reptiles are exempt from tetanus, mice and rats from diphtheria. Again, children are much more prone to certain diseases (as measles, scarlatina, diphtheria, etc.) than adults. Certain individuals appear immune against diseases to which others of the same species readily succumb. A familiar example of acquired immunity, on the other hand, is that which follows an attack of yellow fever, or smallpox, typhoid fever, scarlet fever, etc. Immunity of this character, which depends upon actual infection, is called active immunity, since the body itself is active in its production. This is in contradistinction to passive immunity, which is referable to the introduction of protective substances from without. Such immunity is seen, for example, following protective injections of diphtheria antitoxin. Knowledge regarding the essential factors which are operative in the production of immunity to disease is still very defective, but many points have been worked out from which a general idea of the process can be formed. Through the researches of Ehrlich and his pupils in Germany more especially, and of Metchnikoff and Bordet in France, besides many others, the concept of immunity has been materially amplified; for it has been shown that the animal body has a mechanism of self-protection which is of the most extensive character and is directed not only against the harmful effects of bacteria but also against all alien cellular elements and cell-products of whatever kind, in so far, at least, as these latter are of an albuminous character. Thus it has been ascertained that the injection of certain soluble toxins leads to the production of corresponding antitoxins, as in diphtheria, tetanus, botulism, and poisoning with certain vegetable toxins, as ricin, abrin, crotalin, etc. Similarly, the introduction of various tissue-cells of an alien species leads to the formation of corresponding cytolysins or cytotoxins, such as hemolysins, leucolysins, neurolysins, endotheliolysins, spermatolysins, and so on apparently without limit. Then, again, it was shown that the injection of certain cells calls forth the production of corresponding agglutinins, which cause the clumping or coalescence of the cells in question. Various albuminous substances similarly lead to the production of bodies which, when brought together with the first, cause the formation of precipitates—the precipitins. There are also the coagulins, which result on injection of certain albumins; the antiferments; and so on. Thus it is seen that the introduction into the body of almost any foreign substance of an albuminous character (antigen) is followed by the production of a corresponding antagonistic or antibody. It is accordingly necessary to extend the meaning of the term immunity to include the general defensive reaction on the part of the body to the action of foreign cellular elements or their constituents. As regards the mechanism by which the various antibodies are formed and immunity is accordingly produced opinions differ, but there is a general tendency to accept the explanation offered by Ehrlich and his pupils, which is based upon the now famous lateral-chain theory (see below). The general study of immunity has led to a vast amount of experimental research, and to results of the utmost practical importance. Thus the discovery of diphtheria antitoxin has furnished a cure for one of the most fatal diseases to which man is subject. Tetanus is now successfully combated by an antitetanin. Snake-bite poisoning, which in India is annually responsible for many thousands of deaths, is readily amenable to specific treatment in a large percentage of cases. Antirabic treatment has lowered the fatality percentage of rabies to nearly one per cent. In many other diseases to which man is subject altogether satisfactory antisera have not as yet been developed, but a certain degree of protective immunity can be established in some, as in plague, typhoid fever, and dysentery. In these cases immunization is effected by means of attenuated cultures of the corresponding organisms. Of vast economic importance is the successful immunization of certain animals against diseases which would otherwise prove highly fatal, as of sheep against anthrax and of cattle against rinderpest. Important from the standpoint of prophylaxis, also, is the possibility of promptly recognizing the existence of tuberculosis in cattle by the injection of tuberculin, and, to judge from recent reports, it now seems possible also to immunize actively against the disease in question. Ehrlich's lateral-chain theory, upon which the modern doctrine of immunity is largely based, explains better than any other the various experimental data that have been elaborated within recent years. According to it, the living cell contains a formative central nuclear complex, the Leistungskern of Ehrlich, to which other molecular groups, the so-called side-chains or receptors, are united. Through the union of food material with these side-chains the nutrition of the cell is maintained. Through these same side-chains, however, the cell is also open to attack by the most diverse foreign agents, provided that the chemical constitution of the latter is analogous to that of the usual food material of the cell, or, as Ehrlich puts it, provided that the deleterious agents possess

S.*) upon receptors I, II, and III (rI, rII, rIII) of the body-cells; B, cast-off free receptors (haptins); C, action of antibodies upon the soluble products (toxins) of cells or the cells themselves; D, action of anti-agglutinins, anti-immune bodies, anticomplements, which result on injection of agglutinins, hemolysins, etc.; E, soluble products — toxins, ferments; F, insoluble substances, producing agglutinins and coagulins; G, insoluble substances, leading to production of cytotoxic (bactericidal) immune substances; b, toxophoric group; c, haptophoric group; d, h, p, body-cells; k (k-1 to k-5), cells used in immunization; a, complement; e, antitoxin, antiferment; i, haptophoric group; j, zymphoric group — coagulins, agglutinins; q, cytophilic group; r, complementophilic group — immune body of the hemolysins, bacteriolysins, etc.; f, toxin; g, antitoxin; l, agglutinin; s, complement; t, immune body; m, agglutinin; n, anti-agglutinin; u, complement; v, anticomplement; w, immune body; x, complement; y, immune body; z, anti-immune body. groups, or haptophores, which will fit the receptors of the cell. Ehrlich recognizes three varieties of receptors, which he classifies as belonging to the first, the second, and the third order. Those of the first and second orders contain only one combining group for the alien material, which is to act upon the cell; for this reason they are termed uniceptors: while the receptors of the third order have two combining groups and are called amboceptors. In the case of the receptors of the second and third orders the alien material, antigen or immunizing body, as it is generally termed, is capable of producing its specific effect upon the cell only in the presence of a ferment-like substance which must be especially supplied, as the so-called complement in the case of receptors of the third order, while in those of the second such a complex represents an integral component of the receptor (the zymophoric group). If, now, a foreign substance of a harmful nature effects a union with some of the receptors of a cell, these receptors are practically lost to the cell. In accordance with Weigert's overproduction theory, this loss, unless the cell has been injured beyond the possibility of recovery, is then not only made up by the production of other receptors of the same kind, but an overproduction occurs. The supernumerary side-chains are thrown off, and now circulate in the blood in the free state. In this condition they are known as haptines, and, like the original sessile receptors, they may be of the first, second, or third order, as already described. As their presence in the blood in the free state prevents the access of foreign cellular products to the cell, these haptines are antagonistic in their action to that of the alien material, and thus constitute true protective bodies. For this reason they are termed antibodies, or adaptation-products, the latter term indicating that they are formed as a result of an effort on the part of the body to adapt itself to the presence of the foreign substances. The sera in question are similarly known as antisera or immune sera. Upon this basis natural immunity is readily explained by the assumption that receptors corresponding to the infecting agent are lacking, so that an attack upon the cell is impossible. Acquired immunity, on the other hand, is the result of infection and the consequent formation of antibodies. It may be antitoxic or bactericidal in nature, according to the character of the infecting agent. Antitoxic immunity is thus far known to develop in only three conditions, namely, in diphtheria, tetanus, and botulism. Bactericidal immunity, in contradistinction to antitoxic immunity, depends upon the production of more complicated antibodies, namely, haptines of the third order (amboceptors, immune bodies, etc.), in which a coaction of a ferment-like complement is necessary to produce the specific effect. Passive immunity depends upon the introduction of specific antibodies from without, and can also be of the antitoxic or bacteriolytic type, according to the nature of the substances employed.—Atreptic immunity, immunity which is dependent upon the absence of a specific substance x, which is essential to continued growth, in the case of malignant tumors.—Opsonic immunity, immunity which is dependent upon the presence in the body of opsonins, to which, in turn, the phagocytic activity of the leucocytes is referable.

impressionism, n. The name was first given to an advanced school of modern painting in France, based on the principle that effects of light in nature are momentary, and that the painter, if he wishes to be true to nature, should confine his attention and effort as closely as possible to the moment of their occurrence. In order to express the high key of natural light, a coterie of extreme impressionists, called pointillists, have used pure color laid on in points or dots. See the extract.

The words Impressioniste, Impressionisme, are said to have arisen from a phrase in the preface to Manet's catalogue of his pictures exhibited in 1867 during the Exposition Universelle, from which he was excluded. "It is the effect," he wrote, "of sincerity to give to a painter's works a character that makes them resemble a protest, whereas the painter has only thought of rendering his impression." An alternative origin is a catalogue in which Claude Monet entitled a picture of sunrise at sea "Une Impression." The word was probably much used in the discussions of the group, and was caught up by the critics as characteristic. Encyc. Brit., XXIX. 412.

Such that every operation of the group either interchanges the objects of a subset among themselves, or changes them all into the objects of some other subset. When this is the case the group is called imprimitive in respect of the set; otherwise the group is called primitive. A group which is doubly-transitive, in respect of a set of objects, obviously cannot be imprimitive.

See the following phrase.—Urinary indican. The indol which is formed during the process of intestinal putrefaction is in part oxidized to indoxyl and absorbed. In the body it then unites with sulphuric acid, namely, sodium or potassium sulphate, and in this form is known as animal indican. As such it appears in the urine. Normally the amount which is thus eliminated is small; larger quantities are met with in those pathological conditions which are associated with an increased degree of intestinal putrefaction. The test for indican in the urine is based upon the decomposition of the substance by means of a mineral acid, and the oxidation of the liberated indoxyl to indigo blue.

The most important indicators are litmus, lacmoid, phenol-phthalein, methyl orange, and cochineal.

An indicator, to be of service in acidimetric processes, must be a substance of basic or acid character, which, like litmus, will show by a change of color, the presence of the slightest excess of free acid or alkali.

(h) In railroad signaling, a device for informing the leverman in a signal-cabin that a train is about to start from the station and indicating which track it will take; in its broadest sense, any appliance for displaying, in the signal-cabin, the condition of a track or of all the tracks in a yard, the position of the signals, semaphores, switches, and signal-lamps, the trains at rest, or moving, or about to enter or leave any block, etc. The indicator may be a number on a drop-plate, a disk or banneret, or a miniature signal-arm, and it may give information by its appearance or disappearance or by its position. It may also give a signal by means of a bell. An indicator may be operated from a distant station or cabin by a push-button, or it may be automatic, or it may be controlled by a train through a track-circuit. (j) Naval: (1) An apparatus used in conjunction with a transmitter, operated by mechanical or electrical means for signaling orders from a central position to the various places on a war-ship at which the orders are to be executed. The transmitter is manipulated by the operator in the central station or in the conning-tower to show any desired order, and the same order is shown on one or more indicators connected to the transmitter by wires or shafting. A range-indicator shows the range of the object at which the guns are to be fired; a battle-order indicator shows various orders such as 'commence firing,' 'load with shell,' etc. (2) An apparatus to show at a convenient point the position of any mechanism: as, a revolution-indicator to show the direction of revolution of the main engines; a rudder-indicator, to show the position of the helm or rudder; a turret-indicator, to show the position of the turret guns with reference to the fore-and-aft line of the ship; etc.—Battle-order indicator, an apparatus placed near the guns of a war-ship to indicate mechanically the orders of the captain, such as 'commence firing,' 'load with common shell,' etc. It is worked by electrical or mechanical means from a battle-order transmitter in the conning-tower or station of the captain on the bridge. See ★indicator (j) (1).—Integrating indicator, an engine-indicator combined with a recording apparatus for measuring, and usually for recording, the power developed by the engine in a number of revolutions. It consists of an indicator on the drum of which rests a wheel carried at the end of the arm of a planimeter. This planimeter-arm is moved up and down by the pencil-motion, and the recording-wheel is operated by the wheel at the end of the arm. indicator-card (in'di-kā-tor-kärd″), n. A diagram which shows the pressure in the cylinder of an engine at any point of the stroke. It is made by an engine-indicator. This card is made to a definite quantitative scale for both height and length, and its area is therefore proportional to the work performed by the engine in one stroke. The horse-power calculated from the area of such a card is called the indicated horse-power. Its area divided by its length gives the mean height, and such mean height is the mean pressure during that stroke when multiplied by the scale of ordinates as related to the pressures. See indicator, 1 (a).

indicator-cock (in'di-kā-tor-kok″), n. A three-way cock so arranged that any steam left in the pipe after making a diagram (indicator-card) will be exhausted into the atmosphere when the valve is turned to cut off steam from the end of the cylinder. It also establishes atmospheric pressure-ordinates upon the indicator-diagram, and by comparison with a barometer-reading absolute pressures can be established.

In crystal., a surface, in general (for a biaxial crystal) an ellipsoid having axes proportional to the principal refractive indexes, whose geometrical characters serve to exhibit the optical relations of the crystal: for a uniaxial crystal the surface becomes a spheroid and for an isotropic crystal a sphere. The indicatrix bears a simple relation to Fresnel's ellipsoid the axes of which are proportional to the reciprocals of the refractive indexes, that is, directly proportional to the light-velocities in the given axial direction. L. Fletcher, The Optical Indicatrix, London, 1892.

individual. I. a.—Individual telesis, telics, variation. See ★telesis, etc.

II. n. (d) In biol.: (2) A living being considered as unique or different from its kind and from the rest of nature, without reference to its morphological or physiological independence or dependence. It is in this sense that an organism is termed an individual with reference to reproduction and inheritance.

[When amongst] individuals, apparently exposed to the same conditions, any very rare deviation, due to some extraordinary combination of circumstances, appears in the parent—say, once amongst several million individuals —and it re-appears in the child, the mere doctrine of chances almost compels us to attribute its re-appearance to inheritance. Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 10.

Genealogical individual, the series of stages between the fertilized egg and sexual maturity. Huxley.

individuality, n. 5. In biol.: (a) Physiological completeness or independence; the ability of an organism to perform its normal functions or live out its life without the cooperation of others. The independence of a unicellular protozoon is an example of physiological individuality, as contrasted with the dependence of one of the cells of a metazoön upon the others and the whole. A physiological individual is sometimes termed a bion, as contrasted with a morphological individual or morphon. See ★bion and ★morphon, 2. (b) Structural independence, or homology with or morphological equivalence to a physiological individual. The homology of each of the dependent members of a siphonophore with an independent hydra is an illustration of morphological individuality. So far as each of the constituent cells in the body of a metazoön is homologous with an independent protozoön it is a morphon, or morphological individual. Morphologists recognize and give names to several grades or categories of morphological individuality. See plastid, idorgan, person, 8, and ★cormus, 3. (c) The uniqueness of a living being, or its difference from others of its kind and from the rest of nature. It is in this sense that the offspring is said to inherit the individuality or constitution of a parent.—Multiple individuality, a term used by L. F. Ward to designate the structural or physiological independence of the units which make up the structure of a compound organism, such as the cells which compose the body of a metazoön.

Multiple Individuality. Each cell still acts and feels for itself, and maintains its individuality within the higher individuality.

individuation, n. 3. In biol.: (a) A general term summarizing the conditions for the maintenance and perpetuation of an individual organism, when these conditions are considered collectively and in contrast with those which conduce to the generation of new beings.

Again, what is to be made of the expression "Indo-Abyssinian," or even "Abyssinian" at all as an ethnical term? The very word (Habeshi) means "mixed," and in African ethnology "Abyssinian" conveys no more meaning than does "Hungarian" in European ethnology; both are national not racial designations, and as a Hungarian may be a Magyar, a Slav, a Rumanian or a Teuton, so an Abyssinian may be a Hamite (Agao and others), or a Semite (Tigré and others). Keane, Ethnology, p. 170.

inductance, n. It is the property of an electric current in a circuit (called the inducing circuit) of producing a magnetic field surrounding the circuit, which when changing induces an electromotive force in a circuit surrounded by this field or a part thereof (called the induced circuit). If the induced and the inducing circuit are the same, the property is called self-inductance, otherwise mutual inductance. Unit inductance is the number of lines of magnetic force produced by unit current in the inducing circuit and interlinked with the conductor of the induced circuit: 10^9 times this unit is the practical unit of inductance, called a henry.—Ferric inductances. See ★ferric.—Inductance factor. See ★factor.—Mutual inductance, the numerical value of mutual induction; the coefficient of mutual induction. inductance-shunt (in-duk'tans-shunt), n. See ★shunt.

induction, n. 6. Magnetic induction is the flux density in a medium such as iron when subjected to a magnetizing force. It is expressed in terms of a unit called the gauss, namely, the number of lines of force per square centimeter of cross-section of the substance. Induction, thus numerically defined, is usually designated by the letter B; the magnetizing force to which it is due, by the letter H. Induction is frequently determined by winding a ring-shaped piece of the iron to be tested with two coils of wire, the primary and the secondary coil. The secondary coil is connected to a ballistic galvanometer and a known current is suddenly sent through the primary coil. The magnetic field thus established within the iron induces a flow of electricity through the secondary coil and through the galvanometer, which affords a measure of the induction. The relation is expressed by the equation

where Q is the quantity of electricity as measured by the deflection of the galvanometer, R is the resistance of the secondary circuit, S is the cross-section of the iron, and n_2 is the number of turns of wire in the secondary coil. The relation between induction and the magnetizing force may be expressed graphically by means of a curve, called the curve of induction, in which ordinates represent the values of the induction B and abscissæ the corresponding values of the magnetizing force H. The curve rises slowly for small magnetizing forces and then sharply, for a time, until the iron approaches saturation, after which the slope of the curve diminishes. These changes in the direction of the curve are due to variations in the permeability of the iron, which increases with the magnetizing force, reaches a maximum, and then diminishes again indefinitely. The induction B is not identical with the magnetization I which is defined by the equation

Curve of Magnetic Induction in Iron.

$$I = \frac{B - H}{4\pi}$$

7. The leading or admission of steam into a cylinder.—Bipolar induction. See unipolar ★induction.—Chemical induction, in phys. and photog. chem., the phenomenon in which light, falling on a sensitive substance, does not at once act with its full intensity, but at a much less rate, and attains its maximum action only after a certain time—measured in thousandths of a second in the case of a photographic plate, but in minutes in the case of a sensitive mixture of chlorin and hydrogen.

A second very remarkable phenomenon, first pointed out by the authors, is that of chemical induction. This refers to the fact that the action of light on the sensitive mixture of chlorine and hydrogen does not begin in its full intensity, but that it slowly increases, until after the lapse of a certain time it attains its regular and maximum rate. Smithsonian Rep., 1899, p. 620.

If the boundary line of two contrasting surfaces is steadily fixated, contrast gradually changes into its opposite; the sensory effect of the local stimulation spreads more and more widely over the background. This is simultaneous light induction.—Successive light induction, in physiol. and psychol. optics, the persistence of the phenomenon of simultaneous light induction after removal of the inducing stimulus, or closure of the eyes.—Total magnetic induction, the total flux in any space, measured in maxwells or unit lines.—Tube of induction, in magnetism, an imaginary tube the generating lines of which are the lines of force or lines of induction in a magnetic field, and whose form is such that the surface integral over any cross-section has a constant value.

There is, besides, the polarization current due to gravity, a second sort of reverse current, viz. the induction currents (induced by viscosity), which, with eddies interposed as friction wheels, flow parallel with and in the opposite sense to the primary ocean currents. *Geog. infinitive, n.—Gerundial infinitive. See ★gerundial.—Split (or cleft) infinitive, a name conveniently used to designate briefly the infinitive phrase consisting of the infinitive proper (for example, 'designate,' below) and the so-called 'sign,' the preposition 'to,' when separated by a qualifying adverb or phrase, as in 'to briefly designate,' 'to readily understand,' 'to suddenly and completely change one's attitude.' This use is in high disfavor with literary critics and purists who write upon the subject, but it occurs abundantly in English literature from the seventeenth century down. Nearly every 'standard author' is 'guilty' of it, as Fitzedward Hall and others have shown, and it is thoroughly established in popular speech. It is often dictated by a sense of rhythm, the placing of the adverb after the verb and before the weak adjunct or object which follows the verb resulting often in disharmony of rhythm and stress. The idiom is a perfectly natural development of the conditions given—a verb to be qualified, a stress qualifier, and an unstressed syllable (to) of no definite meaning. This syllable to is instinctively treated as a or the is treated in a similarly stressed sequence of adjective and noun ('a brief designation,' 'the proper order,' etc.)

The onset is usually abrupt with headache, backache, fever, and loss of strength. According to the organs most affected in its further progress, the disease is said to be of the respiratory, nervous, or gastro-intestinal form. Influenza is noteworthy for the rapidity with which an epidemic sweeps over entire countries and even from one continent to another, and for the large proportion of the population attacked when it is prevalent. The disease is caused by a small, non-motile bacillus which occurs in great numbers in the nasal and bronchial secretions of the patients. Influenza has a low death rate, but its effect on the general health is often severe and lasting, and many grave sequelæ are possible. One attack does not protect against a second. The ordinary influenza or 'grippe,' though in some ways simulating true epidemic influenza, is a different and much milder disease.

In all cases where, population not being homogeneous, the different portions of a country . . . are variously coloured as by race, or religion, or history, or employments, the argument against centralisation acquires new force, in proportion as the central agent loses the power of sympathy and close adaptation to peculiar wants and wishes, and may lose also, where relations have not been altogether kindly, even the consciousness of this ingenital defect. Gladstone, Irish Question, ii. 49.

The longer the poling is continued the freer will the copper be from oxygen. See ★over-pole. For ingots or cakes the amount of oxygen may be greater than for copper which is to be cast into wire-bars, which are rolled into rods and then drawn into wire for electrical conductors. As impurities reduce the conductivity of copper for electricity very greatly, the oxygen in such cases must be low. Electrochem. Industry, March, 1904, p. 90.

inheritance, n.—Alternative inheritance, the transmission to descendants of the characteristics of one parent by certain individuals, and of those of the other parent by others.

It must, however, be remembered that what is accepted as evidence of alternative inheritance, is not a proof that the dominance of either allelomorph is imperfect.
Bateson and Saunders, Rep. Evol. Com. Roy. Soc., 1902, [I. 129.

Ancestral inheritance, the contribution of each ancestor to the characteristics of descendants. (a) According to Galton's law of ancestral inheritance, the two parents contribute between them, on the average, one half of each inherited faculty, each of them contributing one quarter of it; the four grandparents contribute between them one quarter, or each of them one sixteenth; and so on. (b) According to Pearson's law, the contribution of the grandparents and great-grandparents is greater than Galton's law calls for, and the difference increases rapidly for more remote generations. Parental characteristics are sometimes strongly hereditary, sometimes slightly or not at all so; and while Galton and Pearson assume that these differences will, on the average, balance each other, the facts of inheritance show that this is not the case, and that the statistical laws, while no doubt useful for statistical purposes, are compiled from data some of which are data of inheritance and some not, and that they are of little value to the breeder who deals with individuals, or to the student of inheritance who seeks to distinguish hereditary from non-hereditary characters. So far as a parent resembles collateral relatives, such as brothers, sisters, and cousins, the resemblances are often transmitted to descendants with nearly or quite four times the frequency which these laws require. (c) Mendel's law of ancestral inheritance. In 1865 Gregor Johann Mendel (1822–84), an Austrian priest, published an account of experiments which he had undertaken for the purpose of determining the numerical value of parental characters in inheritance. Having obtained seed from the cross-breeding of two races or varieties of the garden pea which differed from each other in some one characteristic (for example, those with round and those with wrinkled seeds), he found that the cross-bred plants raised from these seeds manifested only one of the characteristics (roundness of seed, for example), which he called the dominant (D), to the total or almost total exclusion of the other (irregularity of seed, for example), which he called recessive (R). The second generation, produced from the cross-bred plants which were allowed to fertilize themselves, instead of being uniform like their parents, broke into the two original forms in the average ratio of three dominants to one recessive. The recessives are themselves pure, and, if allowed to fertilize themselves, give rise to recessives only, for many generations. One third of the dominants are also pure, while the other two thirds produce descendants of which two thirds are dominants and one third pure recessives. Each successive generation consists of dominants and recessives in the ratio, for each 100, of 25 dominants of pure blood, 25 recessives of pure blood, and 50 dominants which produce descendants in the ratio of three dominants to one recessive. This result is expressed by Mendel in the formula, for each successive generation, 25 DD; 50 DR; 25 R; but it may also be expressed as $x^2 + 2xy + y^2$; and the result of cross-breeding with any number of characters conforms closely to the algebraical binomial theorem, or the expansion of $(a + b + c + \ldots\ldots x)^n$. More recent study tends to show that Mendel's results hold good pretty generally, but by no means universally, in similar cases. Experiments and observations for the purpose of discovering the structural equivalent for the numerical law tend to support Mendel's opinion that there are, for two characters, four sorts of germ-cells in the reproductive organs of the cross-bred individuals — dominant ova, recessive ova, dominant male cells, and recessive male cells — and that these are, on the average, equal in number, so that one quarter of the descendants are born from dominant ova fertilized by dominant male cells and are pure dominants; one quarter are born from recessive ova fertilized by recessive male cells, and are pure recessives; and one half are born from the union of an ovum of one sort with a male cell of the other sort, and are able to produce pure dominants, pure recessives, and cross-bred descendants in the original ratio. — Biparental inheritance, inheritance considered in its relation to amphigonic or bisexual reproduction. — Blended inheritance, the manifestation by descendants of an uninterrupted or continuous series of combinations of parental characters. See quotation under ★blend[1], v. i., 3. — Crossed inheritance, the inheritance by a child of one sex of the constitution of the parent of the other sex. [Rare.] — Exclusive inheritance, the manifestation by the offspring of features of resemblance to one parent to the partial or complete exclusion of those of the other.

On another occasion, or in other offspring of one and the same mating, it may not be prepotent, or even the other parent may be prepotent. Such prepotency might exhibit itself in "alternative" or "exclusive" inheritance.
Biometrika, 1903, p. 390.

Material basis of inheritance, that which is handed down from parent to offspring and in the transmission of which reproduction consists. Most authorities are now agreed that the material basis of inheritance is to be identified with the chromatin of the germ-cells. See substance of ★heredity. — Mosaic inheritance. Same as particulate ★inheritance. — Particulate inheritance, the theory that the descendant inherits material particles from the parts of the bodies of a number of ancestors. See ancestral ★inheritance. — Use-inheritance, the hypothetical transmission to descendants of a parental change which is the result of its own activity; the inheritance of an acquired character.

Darwin seems always to have regarded the direct action, of the environment and use and disuse as, at the most, subsidiary causes of variation; but Mr. Herbert Spencer and his followers regard 'use-inheritance' as an all-important factor in evolution; while Cope and his followers in America, by a mixture of 'use-inheritance' (Kinetogenesis) and Lamarck's neck-stretching theory (Archæsthetism), apparently see their way to account for the evolution of animals with but little help from natural selection.

[L., 'in the condition of being born.'] In chem., in the nascent stage; in the condition of a substance at the moment of its separating from a compound, when it frequently exhibits a greater degree of chemical activity than it does after complete isolation: thus nascent hydrogen will decompose silver chlorid at atmospheric temperature, though hydrogen gas will not. This may be explained by the assumption that the hydrogen is evolved from combination as an immense number of single atoms, freely capable of uniting to those of some other element, but that they do not remain single, but promptly unite into molecules consisting each of two similar atoms, there being evidence that ordinary hydrogen gas consists of such diatomic molecules, and that subsequently these molecules must be broken up if their constituent atoms are to become combined with those of another element.

instinct, n. 1. The definition of 'instinct,' and the demarcation of the range of instinct in the individual life, have long constituted a serious difficulty, both for the biologist and for the psychologist. Popular psychology (which rests upon a Cartesian dualism, and operates with the 'faculties' of eighteenth-century psychology) distinguishes instinct, as the dominant faculty of the animal mind, from reason, which is the prerogative and characteristic of the human mind. The division of labor among ants and bees, the 'prevision' of the caterpillar in spinning a cocoon, the bird's skill in nest-building,—all these things are ascribed to the guiding power of instinct. And the general faculty is subdivided into such minor faculties as the instinct of self-preservation, the parental instinct, the play instinct, etc. Here, of course, is no attempt at analysis, but merely a more or less complete logical classification under a common term. Some change, no doubt, has been wrought in this popular view by the doctrine of organic evolution. The gap between man and the lower animals has been bridged; instinct and reason are included under a 'generic identity'; rudimentary reason is ascribed to animals; and there is greater readiness to admit an instinctive factor in human conduct. But, in principle, the common-sense notion of instinct is the faculty-notion. It must be said now, that the term instinct cannot, in scientific usage, be regarded as a psychological term. The phenomena covered by the word are biological, in the widest sense of this adjective; specifically, they belong to the class known as psychophysical, that is to say, they have two sides, a physiological and a mental. If instinct is defined simply as a physiological phenomenon, it cannot be differentiated from other, non-instinctive activities. But similarly, if it is defined simply in psychological terms, it cannot be distinguished from other mental complexes,—from other modes of the action-consciousness. An adequate definition must pay regard both to psychology and to physiology; in other words, must be biological. Taking the objective or physiological side of instinct first, we find that it presents four chief characters: it is a mode of response to stimulus that is inherited; that is common to a group or species; that is relatively complex; and that is obviously adaptive. So regarded, it is not markedly different from the reflex, on the one hand, and the secondary or acquired reflex (such activities, for example, as bicycle riding), on the other. Its differentiation from the former must, in the last resort, depend upon its relative complexity; its differentiation from the latter, on its being inherited and not acquired. The former difference is, at best, only one of degree; the latter need be no more than a difference in the date at which the race acquires a certain habit of reaction. To these, however, must be added the psychological or subjective characters. The instinct-consciousness is an associative consciousness in which the situation-stimulus (the first term) is followed by a series of organic sensations, the sensations accompanying the instinctive movements. These processes, the perception of the situation and the organic consequences, hold the attention; the performance of the instinctive movements is highly pleasant, their inhibition highly unpleasant. In other words, the instinct-consciousness is a complex 'feeling,' not differentiable in type from other serial feelings. Putting together, however, the two sets of characters, objective and subjective, we have a biological or psychophysical phenomenon which is distinctly marked off from others of the same class. Two remarks may be added, by way of caution: (1) In animals endowed with memory, and therefore especially in man, the 'pure' instinct will occur only on the first presentation of the appropriate situation. When the situation recurs, the reaction to it will be complicated by memory of the foregone instinctive activities. (2) Many biologists would reduce such reactions as those of ants and bees to mere reflexes, denying the presence of mental processes in these creatures. The question cannot here be discussed: the answer to it, however, does not affect the definition of instinct just given. Of the origin of instinct there are three current theories. The first regards them as developments from the reflex,—as reflexes into which mental process has in some way been 'imported.' The second regards them as reductions from the impulse: actions, at first performed with full consciousness, have gradually been mechanized, retaining only so much of the impulse-consciousness as is indicated above; and the half-mechanized actions have become ingrained in the nervous system, and so inheritable. The third theory suggests that individual accommodations, conscious or unconscious, may serve the purpose of the species until congenital variations (the material of natural selection) appear to replace them by permanent endowment. This last is the most recent theory, and also, perhaps, the theory which stands in the forefront of current discussion.—Acquired instinct, an instinct developed by definite individual experience during a single lifetime.—Instinct-action, in psychol., the hypothetical mode of reaction of an isolated living cell. See the quotation.

If we could isolate a living cell we must assume that it would react in a definite way to appropriate stimuli, and its reactions we may, if we choose, call its 'instinct-actions.'

As the radius strikes a contact-piece, an electrical circuit is momentarily made, and the making of the circuit coincides with a sound, flash, pressure, electric shock, etc. Very brief intervals of time, marked off by various sense-stimuli, are thus produced. They may be minimally varied, by the shift of a contact-piece; they may be variously filled, by continuous or discrete stimuli; they may be intellect, n.— Economic theory of intellect, an extreme form of pragmatism set forth by Dr. Ernst Mach, according to which general concepts and intelligence generally serve a purely economical purpose in enabling us to foresee how a given line of conduct will be adapted to our wishes. More moderate pragmatists maintain that desires and ends of all kinds essentially involve general concepts, so that, since economy is the adaptation of means to ends, and supposes that there are ends, it is incorrect to say that general concepts have only an economic utility. Common sense refuses to believe that the human mind can create ideas entirely unlike anything real, and therefore it is incredible that purpose should be purely illusory.

intensity, n.— Calorific intensity. See ★calorific.— Communal intensity, increase of numbers or activity, as of insects and parasitic fungi, in conditions of increased population and cultivation.

It is no doubt true that insects and fungi spread more rapidly than formerly because of the greater number and continuity of orchards, just as contagious diseases spread faster in cities than in the country. In the small and isolated orchards of former days, fungi and insects were confined within closer areas. This phenomenon of rapid distribution, due to greater extent of host-plants, may be termed communal intensity.

interactionism (in-tėr-ak′shon-izm), n. [interaction + -ism.] The metaphysical opinion that body and mind, having like modes of existence, act and react upon each other somewhat as two bodies may do, and that this is the manner in which forces acting upon the organs of sense affect the mind and in which volitions produce contractions of the muscles.

Those who hold this opinion do not consider themselves as materialists for several reasons, among which is their belief that matter can not feel, as the soul can; but they do hold the mind to be, in important respects, similar to matter. The principal advocate of this opinion is Lotze, who is particularly explicit in details in his "Microcosmus" and "Medicinal Psychology."

Interactionism seems almost to necessitate two juxtaposed realities exchanging influences, and thus to imply a metaphysical dualism.
C. A. Strong, Why the Mind has a Body, p. 33.

Interactionism has to maintain, in this concrete form of the 'survival theory,' that the mental process as such is an aid to evolution.

The development of the interferometer is chiefly due to Michelson, but the instrument in its modern form is based upon an extension of the principle used by Jamin in his refractometer. The Jamin refractometer was designed for the measurement of the indexes of refraction of transparent bodies by means of the retardation of a ray of light passing through a given thickness of the substance as indicated by its manner of interference with a ray not thus retarded. In this refractometer two plates of parallel glass of equal thickness, silvered on the back, are mounted in a vertical position with their faces parallel as shown in Fig. I. One of these plates, AA, makes an angle of 45° with the axis of the instrument; the second, BB, can be turned about a vertical axis and its distance from AA can be altered at will. A beam of light passes through the slit S and a portion of it reflected from the first face of AA reaches the other plate BB. That portion of this ray which penetrates the second plate and is reflected from the silvered surface at the back (D) is shown in the diagram. That portion of the incident ray which is transmitted by the plate AA is similarly reflected from the silvered back (C) of that plate and likewise reaches BB, a portion of it being reflected from the first surface of that plate. This ray and the one reflected from the back of BB follow the same path after leaving the second plate. When the plates are parallel the two rays will have followed equal and similar paths and will be in the same phase. If now the plate BB is slightly displaced from its vertical position there will be a difference of phase between the rays and a series of horizontal diffraction-fringes will appear. If a thin plate L of any refracting substance is placed in the path of one of the rays between AA and BB the retardation of the light in transmission through it will produce a shifting of the diffraction-fringes from which the index of refraction of the substance may be computed, if its thickness is known; or its thickness, provided the index is known. The instrument therefore may be used either as a refractometer or an interferometer.—Michelson's interferometer. The principle of this instrument, which is given various forms according to the use to which it is to be put, may be seen from Fig. II. Four plates of plane parallel glass are mounted with their surfaces perpendicular to the bed of the instrument. Parallel rays of light from a source S reach the plate A at an angle of 45°. The back of this plate is covered with a thin film of silver, the density of which is such that approximately half the light is reflected to the plate D while the remainder is transmitted through the plate B to C. C and D are heavily coated with silver on the front face, forming two plane mirrors adjusted so as to return the light falling upon them on the same path. The returning ray from C is in part reflected toward E and the returning ray from D is in part transmitted along the same path. An observer at E, when the instrument is in adjustment, sees a system of bands or fringes due to the interference of these two rays. The plate B, which should be as nearly as possible identical in thickness and optical quality with A, is used to compensate for the difference in the path of the two rays when the distances of C and D from A are equal. To an observer at E, rays turned from the plate D and transmitted by A will be seen to interfere with the rays from C reflected by A, provided the distance traversed by the light in traveling from A to D and back is very nearly equal that from A to C and back. Any relative change in these distances, comparable in amount to a wave-length of light, will produce a shifting of the interference-fringes in the field of view, and it is by the observation of this shift, by means of a micrometer eye-piece not shown in the diagram, that measurements of distance by means of the interferometer are made. The extraordinary delicacy of this method, which enables a skilled observer to detect a movement of either of the mirrors C or D amounting to the one hundredth of the wave-length, or about .0000005 centimeter, has led to the use of the interferometer for refined determinations of various physical constants.

interrupter, n. (a) In elect., a device for periodically making and breaking the primary circuit of an induction-coil. The simplest form of interrupter, and that usually employed with small coils, is the Neff hammer (Fig. 1). It consists of a small block of iron, b, mounted at the free end of a vertical metallic strip or spring, d. When no current is flowing through the primary coil the position is such that the contact-point c is closed. When current flows through the primary coil, however, the core, a, attracts b and the contact-points are separated. The attraction between the iron armature, b, and the core ceases as soon as contact is broken; the spring is released, contact is renewed, the armature is again attracted, and in this way the spring is maintained in rapid vibration, opening and closing the primary circuit at every oscillation. When it is desired to regulate the frequency of interruption, the Neff hammer is modified by the addition of a vertical rod, attached to the free end of the spring, which carries an adjustable weight, and upon the position of this weight the rapidity of interruption will depend. For large coils requiring heavy currents in the primary circuit, which would soon burn out the metallic contact-points of the interrupter just described, the form of mercury - interrupter devised by Foucault, shown in Fig. 2, is frequently used. It consists of a vertical spring of flat steel, i, fixed below and carrying a cross-arm. To this is attached the armature, b, and the contact-points, c and d, which dip from above into glass cups containing mercury. The height of the mercury is so adjusted that when the interrupter is at rest the contact-point c is slightly submerged. The current in the primary circuit, which flows through the mercury into c, thence through the coil of the small electromagnet, a, causes the latter to attract the armature, b, whereupon c rises, breaking circuit as it leaves the mercury. The spring is then released, contact is again made at c, and the interrupter continues to oscillate with a frequency determined by the position of the weight, h. To prevent the formation of an arc and the evaporation of the mercury, a thick layer of spirits of turpentine, alcohol, or oil fills the upper portions of the mercury cups. In the modern development of the induction-coil, particularly as applied to the production of electric waves and of X-rays, numerous other forms of interrupter have been devised. In one of these, the turbine-interrupter, a centrifugal pump forces a jet of mercury against a metal plate, thus furnishing a path for the current. The circuit is made and broken by the intervention of a motor-driven toothed wheel, the speed of which determines the frequency. In other forms of rotary motor-driven interrupters a platinum contact-point is plunged into mercury at each revolution of an eccentric movement attached to the shaft, or a well-insulated commutator is made to revolve in contact with brushes under oil. In the electrolytic interrupter of Wehnelt (Fig. 3), a lead plate, a, and a platinum wire, b, the latter entirely incased in a glass tube with the exception of one or two millimeters at the tip, are immersed in an electrolytic cell containing dilute sulphuric acid. When an electromotive force of from 25 to 80 volts is applied, the direction of the current being such that the lead-plate is a cathode, the flow of current becomes rapidly intermittent and the cell forms a very effective interrupter. At higher voltages the platinum wire becomes surrounded with gas and the action ceases. The frequency of interruption increases with the voltage and it depends likewise upon the surface of platinum exposed. Another form of electrolytic interrupter, devised by Caldwell, consists of a cell with electrodes of lead between which an insulating partition with a small opening is mounted. The flow of current under these circumstances is intermittent, and the frequency of interruption depends upon the size of the hole. Interrupters of the vibrating-hammer type, in which the contact is made and broken in a vacuum, were used as early as 1859 by Poggendorff, and recent forms have been devised by McFarlan Moore. In vacuo sparking is eliminated and oxidation of the contact-points is prevented. The suddenness of interruption when no spark is present to carry the current is moreover advantageous in many lines of work with the induction-coil.—Electrolytic interrupter, in elect., an interrupter for use with induction-coils, in which the current is interrupted by the formation of bubbles of gas by electrolysis at a point where the current is made to pass through an electrolyte. The formation of the bubble, the cessation of the current, the escape of the gas, and the reëstablishment of the current can be made to take place at very short intervals.—Foucault interrupter. See ★interrupter (a).—Krille's interrupter, a device for breaking an electrical circuit which is automatically remade after interruption. The bob of a heavy pendulum carries below a plate of mica, which, as the pendulum swings, cuts through a fine mercury bridge joining two adjacent mercury pools. After the pendulum has passed, the bridge is remade by the flow of the mercury.—Rosapelly's interrupter, an instrument for recording movements of the larynx. It consists of a small weight on a spring, whose inertia closes an electric circuit when its supporting frame is jarred. Scripture, Exper. Phonetics, p. 267. —String-interrupter, an interrupter for induction coils in which a vibrating string is used for periodically making and breaking circuit.—Turbine-interrupter. See ★interrupter (a).—Vapor-interrupter, a mercury arc in a vacuum. Hewitt.—Wehnelt interrupter. See ★interrupter (a).

ion, n. 2. In phys. chem., one of the particles, bearing electric charges, which carry electric currents through the air or other gas. See ★electron, 2.

Preston . . . and Runge and Paschen . . . think it possible that atoms of related elements are composed of the same kind of ions, and that the properties of these elements are determined by the arrangement of the ions in the atom. Encyc. Brit., XXXII. 781.

Electronegative ion, electropositive ion. In phys. chem., the ion, consisting of an atom or of a group of atoms called a radical, which is produced by the electrolytic dissociation of an electrolyte and which moves toward the positive pole or anode is the electronegative ion or the anion. That which moves toward the negative pole or cathode is called the electropositive ion or cation.—Migration of ions, in phys. chem., the movement of electrically charged ions toward the anode and toward the cathode in electrolysis, which is the means by which an electric current is carried through an electrolyte. The frictional resistance to the motion of bodies as small as ions is enormous, and the velocities produced are small. A fall of potential of one volt per centimeter causes the ions of hydrogen at 18° C. to move at the rate of less than 12 centimeters an hour, and all other ions move less rapidly. See Hittorf's ★phenomenon.

-ion[2]. In phys. chem., the word ion added, as a suffix, to the abbreviated name of an atom or radical to form a name for the atom or radical in the ionic state: thus chlorion means an atom of chlorin in the ionic condition; cuprion or cuprion, the ion of univalent and of bivalent copper.

Ionicism (ī-on′i-sizm), n. [Ionic + -ism.] Same as Ionism.

ionium (ī-ō′ni-um), n. [NL. See ★ion, n., 2.] A supposed disintegration-product of actinium from the disintegration of which radium, in turn, results. See the extract.

It has been found that uranium minerals contain a new radio-active element, to which the name "ionium" has been given. The chemical behavior of ionium is similar to that of thorium, from which it can not be separated by the usual reactions characteristic for thorium. Ionium emits an α radiation having a range of about 2·8cm in air, and probably also a β radiation. Results obtained on the growth of radium in solutions of ionium indicate that it is the immediate substance from which radium is formed. It is therefore undoubtedly a disintegration product of uranium intermediate between uranium X and radium. The relative activity of radium and ionium in minerals is in agreement with this assumption.

B. B. Boltwood, in Amer. Jour. Science, May, 1908, p. 381.

The very large ionization of mercury vapour is interesting, as this is a monatomic gas; the process of ionization must, therefore, involve much finer subdivision than the splitting of a molecule into atoms.

Sulphuric acid, which in the fairly strong solutions used by Thomson is only about half dissociated, gives a higher value for the heat of neutralization, so that heat must be evolved when it is ionized. . . . The problem of the cause of solubility still remains unsettled, but towards the explanation of ionizing power some advance has been made.

Encyc. Brit., XXVIII. 15.

(b) To produce ions in (air or other gas): said of Röntgen rays, of cathode and various other rays, of the electric field, of a glowing metal, and of violet light.

The name is also applied to rock-crystal and the cheaper stones to which color is applied by means of a coating on the back to produce the effect of a play of colors. A similar effect is produced by cementing various colored glasses together and then coating them.

Quartz crystals are occasionally met with which are iridescent within, an effect due to fractures and cavities in the interior. Such crystals are cut and sold under the name of iris. iron, n. 2. (e) In golf, a club with an iron head considerably lofted so as to raise the ball.—A-iron, a compact and extremely hard form of iron made electrolytically, using an electrolyte of ferrous chlorid, ferrous sulphate, or ferrous ammonium sulphate and an iron anode. It differs from B-★iron (which see) in that it is harder, more compact, and of a silver-white instead of a grayish color. The use of the terms A-iron and B-iron should be discouraged, since they are liable to be confused with the alpha and beta modification of iron.—Alpha-iron, the allotropic modification of pure iron normal at all temperatures below Ar_2 (760° C.). Alpha-iron is the most magnetic substance known. It crystallizes in the cubic system. On being heated above a temperature of 760° C., it changes into beta-★iron (which see), with absorption of heat.—Beta-iron, an allotropic modification of iron existing between the temperatures of 760° and 900° C. (Ar_2 and Ar_3). Beta-iron is almost without magnetism and crystallizes in the cubic system isomorphically with alpha-iron. On heating above 900° C. beta-iron changes into gamma-iron, with absorption of heat, undergoing also a critical change in electric conductivity.—B-iron, a form of iron produced electrolytically. It differs from A-★iron (which see) by the fact that higher voltage and higher current density are used, and that the electrolyte contains bivalent iron in some complex form, while the anode is made of platinum instead of iron.—Carbide of iron, iron chemically combined with carbon. The only known carbide of iron is cementite. See ★cementite and combined ★carbon.—Chilled iron, cast-iron which has been quickly cooled. The effect of this rapid cooling is to retain the whole, or the greater part, of the carbon (amounting to 3 or 4 per cent.) in solution or in chemical combination with the iron, as distinguished from graphite, which is separated in thin plates and flakes. Chilled iron is usually chilled only on the surface. The effect of this is to give an extremely hard and brittle surface, with a relatively soft and ductile center, where the slow cooling has permitted the carbon the necessary time to separate in the form of graphite. Thus railroad-car wheels are chilled on the tread and flange by being cast against cool iron placed in the molds at these parts. The hard exterior serves to resist the wear of the wheel against the railroad-track, while the more ductile web of the wheel consists of gray iron.—Gamma-iron, an allotropic modification of iron existing above 900° C. (Ar_3). It is almost without magnetism, but on heating above the temperature 1130° C. its magnetism suddenly increases by 50 per cent. of itself. Gamma-iron crystallizes in the cubic system, but is not isomorphous with either beta- or alpha-iron. It forms an isomorphous mixture or solid solution with carbon in all proportions up to 2 per cent. of the latter.—Gray iron, pig- or cast-iron which shows a gray, coarsely crystalline structure when fractured. It is generally used for castings when fine uniform ones are desired. When mixed with a proper proportion of scrap-iron it produces strong, tough castings.—Iron and iron, iron to iron, in mech., actual contact of one piece of metal against the other, no space being left between and no packing inserted.—Iron bacteria. See ★bacterium.—Iron by hydrogen. Same as reduced iron (which see, under reduce).—Iron carbide. See ★carbide.—Iron carbonyl, a compound of iron with carbonyl (carbon monoxid). Two such compounds are known, one a viscid liquid, $Fe(CO)_5$, the other a crystalline solid, $Fe_2(CO)_7$. Possibly the vapor of still another may occur in water-gas, which sometimes, on being burned, deposits oxid of iron.—Iron sulphate, a salt in which iron replaces the hydrogen of sulphuric acid. The two best-known salts of this character are ferrous sulphate, $FeSO_4$, and ferric sulphate, $Fe_2(SO_4)_3$. The former of these crystallizes with 7 molecules of water, as copperas or green vitriol. Both are largely used in the arts, copperas especially being applied to a number of different purposes in dyeing, tanning, disinfecting, purifying coal-gas, the manufacture of pigments, etc.—Magnetic iron, magnetite.—Metallic iron, the metal iron as distinguished from iron ores.—Meteoric iron. See ★meteorite.—Mitis iron, a very pure iron obtained by melting the best Swedish malleable scrap in plumbago crucibles. It is used for small castings, and about 1 per cent. of aluminium, in the form of ferro-aluminium, is added to insure sound casting.—Nitrate of iron, a salt of iron, ferric nitrate; also, a workmen's name for impure ferric sulphate made by oxidizing ferrous sulphate or green vitriol with nitric acid, and much employed as a dyers' mordant.—Parallel iron, a plane-iron of uniform thickness throughout its length: so called to distinguish it from those that are thicker at the lower end.—Passive iron, iron rendered non-corrosive by being heated or treated with acid.—Pisolitic iron ore, concretionary iron ore, usually limonite, in individual masses of about the size of a pea.—Pyrolignite of iron. See ★pyrolignite.—Quevenne's iron. Same as reduced iron (which see, under reduce).—Russia iron, a form of sheet-iron which has a smooth, glossy surface and does not rust. It is made in Russia (although imitations are also made in other countries) by a secret process which consists essentially of hammering the sheets when laid in piles with powdered charcoal between the various sheets. Also called Russian iron.—Silvery iron, a fine-grained quality of cast-iron which has a light-gray color when fractured. The color is usually due to the presence of silicon as an alloy.—Strong iron, a name used by British foundrymen for a grade of cast-iron made by melting pig-iron and scrap-castings in the cupola. By increasing the proportion of scrap, the tensile strength is raised. The pig-iron used must be low in phosphorous, and the scrap must be taken from high-grade strong castings. Such iron will be indented by a hammer-blow without breaking and will have a tensile strength of 20,000 to 24,000 pounds per square inch.—Structural iron, a name applied to a variety of shapes of cross-sections of rolled iron and steel, such as angles, channels, tees, and Z-bars, used in structural ironwork.—Tally iron, a corruption of Italian iron (which see, under iron).—White iron. See white[1].

isomerism, n. In the widest sense this term is applied to any two or more chemical compounds having the same percentage composition. Various degrees and kinds of isomerism are distinguished, the primary distinction being between chemical and physical isomerism. Chemical isomerism may be subdivided as follows: Polymerism, which is applied to compounds with the same percentage composition, but with molecular weights differing by some constant value: example, ethylene, C_2H_4, and butylene, C_4H_8, molecular weights 28 and 56 respectively. Polymerism may be either accidental or generic, according to whether the compounds belong to the same or different classes. Metamerism is applied to compounds with the same percentage composition and molecular weight, but containing homologous radicals in the molecule: examples are propylamine, $C_3H_7NH_2$, ethylmethylamine, $C_2H_5NHCH_3$, and trimethylamine, $N(CH_3)_3$. Chain or nucleus isomerism characterizes compounds which have the same number of similar atoms in the molecule, but in which the carbon atoms forming the nucleus are differently grouped: as, normal butane, $CH_3CH_2CH_2CH_3$, and isobutane, $(CH_3)_3CH$. Position or place isomerism exists in compounds which have similar nuclei but differ in the relative position of certain substituting atoms or radicals in this nucleus: as, primary or α-propyl chlorid, $CH_3CH_2CH_2Cl$, and secondary or β-propyl chlorid, $CH_3CHClCH_3$. Structural isomerism applies to compounds which have the same percentage composition and molecular weight but differ in the arrangement of atoms in their molecules. Physical isomerism characterizes compounds which consist of varying aggregations of chemically similar molecules. It was first used of substances which are now termed geometrical, stereo-isomeric, or optically isomeric. Alloisomerism is a term occasionally applied to geometrically isomeric compounds one of which can pass into the other by the action of heat. Dynamical isomerism is applied to compounds which have perfectly similar linkage and spatial arrangement of atoms, but which differ in energy content, that is, in atomic motion. (Tanatar, Ann. Chem. (Liebig), 273, 55.) Geometrical isomerism or stereo-isomerism marks compounds which have the same constitution, but which differ in the spatial arrangement of certain constituent radicals or atoms. Optical isomerism is applied to stereo-isomeric substances which differ in their action on a ray of polarized light: they either deflect it to the right (dextrorotatory), to the left (levorotatory), or are optically inactive (racemic or mesoform).

Joubert disk, a device for the study, by the step-by-step method, of alternating currents and of similar periodic phenomena. It consists of a disk or collar of insulating material with a narrow radial sector of metal. The disk is mounted upon the shaft of the machine or generator for which the type of the wave-form of current is to be determined; or in some cases it is driven synchronously with the machine by means of a separate motor. An adjustable brush, b, makes contact with the metallic sector, a, once in every revolution, and the instantaneous electromotive force for the portion of the cycle corresponding to the position of the brush is measured by means of a condenser and ballistic galvanometer, or by means of some other suitable instrument placed in circuit with the wires + and —. By shifting the brush successively to different points on the periphery a series of measurements is obtained from which a curve representing the cyclic fluctuations in the current generated by the machine may be drawn. This method, which is known as the step-by-step (or point-to-point) method, is applicable only to cases in which the form of the curve is constant and the wave-form repeats itself over and over without sudden changes.

keel[1], n. 2. In iron ship-building, owing to the facility with which the plates and bars can be combined in a variety of shapes, the forms of keels are very numerous. There are two principal classes, the bar-keel (also called hanging keel), which projects below the bottom, and the flat-plate keel, which forms part of the bottom surface. The ordinary bar-keel is formed of lengths of heavy iron or steel bars scarfed together at the ends. The garboard-plates are flanged down against the sides of the keel-bar and the whole is riveted together. (See cut.) The side-bar keel consists of a central vertical keel-plate extending up to the top of the frame-floors, which are secured to the keel-plate by short angle-bars on each side. Below the bottom of the frame, on each side of the vertical keel, are heavy iron side-bars, and flanged down against them are the garboard-plates as in the ordinary single bar-keel. In modern war-ships and large merchant steamers the flat-plate keel is used almost exclusively. (See cut.) The keel consists of an outer flat keel-plate, an inner flat keel-plate, a vertical keel-plate, upper keel angle-bars, uniting the vertical keel to the flat keelson-plate, and lower keel angle-bars, uniting the vertical keel to the flat keel-plates. The vertical keel-plate in war-ships is frequently lightened with large holes. In medium-sized merchant vessels there is but a single flat keel-plate instead of an inner and outer plate, but the general construction is otherwise the same. In some ships there is a comparatively narrow flat plate attached to the outside of the flat keel-plate, called a rubbing-plate or rubbing-strip, to prevent chafing when the vessel touches the ground. A slab-keel is a heavy flat bar with the flat side horizontal, attached to the outside of the flat-plate keel for the same purpose. In the earlier iron vessels other types of keel were used. See ★box-keel. A dish-keel is one in which the horizontal keel-plate has a U- or trough-shaped cross-section. A bilge-keel may be made of a projecting bulb-plate secured to the outside plating by angle-bars, or in large ships, particularly war-ships, it is of V-shaped cross-section formed of plates riveted together at their outer edges and secured at their inner edges to the outside plating by angle-bars, the interior of the V-shaped space being filled with wood. See also ★docking-keel.

keelson, n. 2. In iron ship-building, a longitudinal reinforcement of plates and bars in the interior of the vessel above the framing in the bottom. The center-line keelson, or center-keelson, is immediately over the keel, and is frequently built in combination with it. The simplest form is a girder entirely on top of the frames riveted to the reverse bars. The girder is formed of various combinations of plates, bulb-plates, and angle-bars. A box-keelson is one in which the plates and angle-bars are combined in a form of rectangular cross-section. A flat-plate keelson is formed by a flat plate laid on top of the frames and riveted to them and to the vertical keel-plate. There may be additional reinforcements of bars above the flat-plate keelson, or there may be a center-line bulkhead above it. (See cut at ★keel[1], 2.) An intercostal keelson is one built up of a series of intercostal plates between the frames, the upper edges of which project above the reverse frame-bar and are riveted to a line of continuous plates and bars above the frame. A side-keelson is one in the bottom on either side between the center-line and the turn of the bilge. Kefir grains or granules, the name, in the dried state, of a fungus-like growth found on the branches of bushes below the snow-line in the Caucasus, used as the original ferment in making kumiss. It is a mixture of several micro-organisms—a kind of yeast capable of producing alcoholic fermentation, a bacterium producing lactic acid fermentation, and another body which acts on casein so as to render it imperfectly coagulable. When dried the whole mass forms yellowish grains about as large as peas: these are soaked in water before adding them to the milk to be fermented.—Water kefir, kefir made from water and sugar instead of milk: a popular hygienic tonic and appetizing drink for soldiers. The kefir is not a good germ culture medium, and is therefore more healthful than the water from which it is made.
